PREFATORY NOTE.

Sib
At their annual meeting in 1893, the Boards of Trustees and Overseers requested the librarian to issue a new edition of the general catalogue, which should include a concise history of the college. They also directed that this publication should not be distributed to the alumni gratuitously, but should be sold at one dollar a copy, a price that does not exceed the actual cost of manufacture.

Red July 34
The librarian soon found that the preparation of a concise history which should be both authoritative and symmetrical, involved the careful examination of a much larger amount of documentary matter than his other duties would allow him to undertake. To write a brief history well, one must first write a full history accurately. He has accordingly confined himself to issuing a historical sketch in which accuracy and a fair degree of completeness have been sought, but which, with the possible exception of the first chapter, does not claim to be based upon the perusal and study of all the original authorities and sources of information that have occurred to him as worthy of consultation.

Plans h
The large amount of illustrative and interesting material to be found in old documents and in printed addresses which were not apparently used in the valuable history of the college prepared by Messrs. Cleveland and Packard, has led him to quote freely from both these sources, believing that the very words of the chief actors and their contemporaries afford truer pictures than would any attempt of his to remould them into his own narrative.

The general catalogue has been prepared on substantially the same plan as the last, that of 1889. It aims to give the date and place of birth, also, when necessary, of death, the residence and occupation, and the academic degrees of every graduate. Membership in the upper branches of State Legislatures and in Congress, the holding of other of the higher political and judicial offices, and service in the late civil war are noticed. As a rule, residence in different places is not given unless the person has resided in each ten years. Change of occupation and other considerations, however, have frequently modified the application of this principle. When not otherwise stated the place of death is the residence last mentioned. Every one who detects an error, or can supply any deficiency, is earnestly requested to inform the compiler at once.

It was decided shortly before the printing had begun, to include in a separate list all regularly admitted academic students who had not received a degree from the institution. It was impossible in the brief time at his disposal for the compiler to engage in as extended inquiries as he would otherwise have attempted. It is sincerely hoped that many of the imperfect records in this portion of the catalogue will be completed at once through the co-operation of those who consult it. The names of many, known in earlier times as "university students," and more recently as "special students," have been omitted, because there was no source from which a satisfactory list could be compiled.

The length of time, four months, during which the volume has been in press, has rendered it possible to add at the close of the historical sketch numerous facts and dates received too late for insertion in their proper place in the catalogue.

The writer takes this opportunity to express his gratitude for aid rendered by numerous correspondents, by several of the student assistants in the library, by General Joshua L. Chamberlain, LL.D., and Professor Jotham B. Sewall, A.M., who have read the advance sheets of the historical sketch, and especially by the assistant librarian, whose untiring labor has alone made it possible to prepare and print the volume without undue neglect of the routine work of the library.

CHAPTER I.

THE ESTABLISHMENT.

Need and general desire for a college in Maine—First movements—Legislative delays—Location—Provisions of the charter—Criticism and proposed change—College townships—Massachusetts Hall.

BOWDOIN COLLEGE does not trace its origin to the munificence of an individual, the zeal of a denomination, or the development of a previously-existing school of lower grade. Its establishment was due to a wide-spread feeling among the people in the District of Maine that a college was needed within their borders. The population of the three counties of York, Cumberland, and Lincoln, which, in 1778, acquired the name of the District of Maine by the action of the Continental Congress, increased rapidly after the close of the War of the Revolution. The census of 1790 showed, in round numbers, one hundred thousand inhabitants. Many of these were natives of the more populous portions of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and accustomed to the educational advantages the older towns had long enjoyed. They desired similar privileges for their children. But they were poor, and the hundred miles that separated Portland from Boston was a more effective barrier than thrice that distance to-day. The cost of a journey from Lewiston to Cambridge exceeded a term's tuition. The higher education, if for any save the few wealthy families, must be had in their midst.

The earliest recorded expression of this desire came from Lincoln County, one of whose representatives had a bill drawn up in 1787 for the establishment of Winthrop College. This name was chosen, the preamble states, out of high respect and gratitude for the character and memory of Governor John Winthrop, and also of others of his name and race, among them Governor John Winthrop, of Connecticut, and John Winthrop, LL.D., late Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy at Harvard. Its government was to be like that of Harvard, its location to be determined by a convention of the clergy of every denomination, and of suitable representatives from the towns or plantations without a minister, together with the justices of the peace and the judge of probate for the County of Lincoln. It was to receive a land grant from the state and to raise ready money by a lottery.¹ The legislative journals do not show that action was taken on this bill; but to it, perhaps, may be attributed the setting apart, in March, 1788, of a township in this county for the use of some college to be established in the future.

The next fall the justices of the peace in the County of Cumberland, in their capacity as a court of sessions, petitioned the General Court of the Commonwealth for a college, quoting in their prayer from the state constitution of 1780. The first part of the second section in the fifth chapter of this instrument reads as follows:

“Wisdom and knowledge, as well as virtue, diffused generally among the body of the people being necessary for the preservation of their rights and liberties; and as these depend on spreading the opportunities and advantages of education in the various parts of the country, and among the different orders of the people, it shall be the duty of Legislatures and Magistrates, in all future periods of this Commonwealth to cherish the interests of literature and the sciences, and all seminaries of them.”

At the same time the Cumberland association of ministers sent a similar petition. This body was composed of Congregational clergymen, who, with a single exception, were graduates of Harvard College. They represented all the churches except three that then held religious services regularly within the county. These petitions were presented in November, 1788, and referred to a committee. No further legislative action is recorded till February, 1790, when leave was granted the petitioners to bring in a bill. For some reason, not now apparent, Hon. Josiah Thacher, who, as an original petitioner and a member of the senate, was earnest for the establishment of a college, did not bring in a bill till January of 1791. It was promptly passed in the upper house. In the lower house it met with opposition because Gorham was selected as the site for the institution, and it was finally referred to the next legislature.

Meantime active measures were taken by different towns in Cumberland County to secure the location of the college within their borders. Rev. Alfred Johnson, of Freeport, secured conditional subscriptions in his vicinity amounting to nearly four thousand dollars, and urged that this town, on the highway between Portland and the Kennebec, was most favorably situated, since, by the last census, as many of the inhabitants of the state lived to the east as to the west of it.

The inhabitants of North Yarmouth assembled in town meeting arrived at the following natural, if somewhat naive, conclusion :

“And also taking into Consideration that this is not a trading or Market-Town, nor like to be, that it has not any County Courts held in it, is much of an inland Town thô accommodated with a good Harbour, and that a Colledge may be set nigher or more remote from the Bay as may be judged most convenient, and yet stand upon some good Road in the vicinity of a Number of Husbandmen, not so much exposed to many Temptations to Dissipation, Extravagance, Vanity and various Vices as great Sea-port Towns frequently are, it became their opinion, judging as they hope with Impartiality, free from local Prejudices, that this Town was the most Suitable Place for fixing the said Colledge.”

They accordingly voted to give conditionally the School Farm of two hundred acres, while a considerable amount was promised in labor or money by individuals.

The people of Portland presented their claim for the college in a long petition, raised thirty-five hundred dollars by subscription, and selected a site “on the top of a height called Braudhall’s Hill about three-fourths of a mile from the central part of the compact settlement.” Their spokesman and most influential advocate, Rev. Dr. Samuel Deane, wrote to a member of the legislature as follows :¹

“In favor of placing the college in Portland, we say, That the people in this vicinity are better able to do something towards building and endowing a college than those in any other part of the county, or of the whole District of Maine; and that were the College voted by the Hon. Court into any other town, no College at all would be erected or endowed. We say also that Portland is far more central and convenient, as it respects the whole County of Cumberland, than any other place is or can be. And that it is not ten miles to the South West of the centre of ye inhabitants of the five Counties; and vastly more convenient for the district, than any other place, for going and returning, by land or water; as well as sufficiently distant from all other colleges and Universities. And that if the two Eastern young counties should in time become populous, there will be plenty of room for another College, 150 miles eastward of this.

We say, Seminaries of learning ought to afford a publick education; and that they ought to be, ever have been, and ever must be in populous places. They ought to be, because it is a matter of importance that students should be in the way of getting some knowledge of men and manners, while their geniuses have a juvenile flexibility, and before their rustick habits become fixed and unalterable; that so they may be more fit to mix with mankind, and to fill publick stations with comfort, and a prospect of usefulness. They ever have been in populous places; witness those in all parts of Europe, and the most of those in America. They on the whole, ever will be in populous places, because a University will be the means of making any place populous, in which it is placed, in one or two centuries.

We say, It will be in favour of the College to be sited in Portland, on account of obtaining provisions: for these the Steward of the College will be able to purchase most of the kinds which will be needed, and at least one fourth part cheaper than they could be got in any other town in the county, as it is already become a considerable market town."

At least three other towns had earnest advocates in the legislature, and the members from the District of Maine were naturally unable to agree. At their request the House of Representatives passed, 15 June, 1791, a bill establishing the College of Maine within the County of Cumberland, leaving the location to be decided later. The Senate, however, did not concur in this action. In January and in June of 1792 this bill was again considered, but the question of place prevented concurrent action by the two branches of the legislature. The next year the differences were outwardly harmonized, and on the 28 March, 1793, a bill incorporating Bowdoin College passed each house. But Governor John Hancock did not sign it. It has been said this failure was due to the name of the institution, that of his late political rival; it is more just as well as more charitable to ascribe it to the location, which was not at Portland. In February and in June of 1794 the matter of location was again considered by the legislature. A formal expression of opinion was sought from each member of the General Court from the District of Maine and a large majority was found to be in favor of Brunswick. This choice was unquestionably of the nature of a compromise, in which geographical position far outweighed any other advantages offered. On Tuesday, 24 June, 1794, the charter of Bowdoin College, having passed both houses, received the signature of Governor Samuel Adams.

It is interesting as well as instructive to note that, during this agitation for a college, five academies, each with a land grant from the commonwealth, had been established in the District of Maine, Hallowell in 1791, Berwick in 1791, Fryeburg in 1792, Washington at East Machias in 1792, and Portland in 1794.

The charter states the purpose of the institution to be the education of youth; and adds that its funds are to be appropriated in such manner as shall most effectually promote virtue and piety, and the knowledge of such of the languages and of the useful and liberal arts and sciences as the corporation shall direct. It defines at length the officers and the provinces of the two bodies associated in the government of the college. These are the Trustees and the Overseers. The former board consists of not more than thirteen nor less than seven, of whom the President and the Treasurer of the college are ex officio members. They have the right to remove any one of their number when, by reason of age or otherwise, he shall become incapable of discharging the duties of his office; to fill all vacancies; to hold real and personal estate, the net annual income of which shall not exceed "ten thousand pounds";¹ to confer such degrees as are usually conferred by universities;¹ to elect the president, professors, and instructors, to fix their salaries and define their duties; in general to serve as the executive board of the institution. No corporate business, however, can be transacted unless seven Trustees are present, and no act of theirs is valid until it is agreed to by the Overseers. These also form a corporate body, consisting of not more than forty-five nor less than twenty-five persons, of whom fifteen form a quorum. The President of the college and the Secretary of the Trustees are ex officio members. The Overseers have the right to remove a member for incapacity or neglect of duty; to fill all vacancies in their number; to require an account of the Treasurer of the college and to fix his bond; and, most important of all, to veto any act of the Trustees. No person except the President and the Secretary of the Trustees can be at the same time a member of each Board. The legislature has the right to grant further powers to the corporations, or to alter or annul existing powers as far as necessary to promote the best interests of the college.

¹Ten thousand pounds was equivalent to $33,333. By enabling acts passed by the legislatures of Massachusetts and Maine in 1891, and accepted by the Boards of the college, this proviso is removed, and the institution is not restricted as to the amount of funds it may hold in carrying out the purpose of its charter.

The closing section of the charter grants, from the unappropriated lands belonging to the Commonwealth, five townships, each six miles square, with the provision that the Trustees or their assigns should cause fifteen families to be settled on each of these townships within twelve years. The customary reserve is also made in each township of three lots of three hundred and twenty acres each, for the first settled minister, for the use of the ministry, and for the use of the schools.

The provisions of this charter were manifestly influenced by those of Harvard College,² which then had a Board of Overseers that included the clergymen of the vicinage and the members of the State Senate. The first draft of the bill for the establishment of the "College of Maine" provided a single board of control, consisting of seventeen persons, of whom a majority should be laymen. The disadvantages resulting from the conduct of college

¹ A proviso restrained the corporation from conferring any degrees except those of Bachelor of Arts and Master of Arts until January 1, 1810.

² Of the New England colleges, only Harvard, Brown, Bowdoin, and Bates have this twofold form of government.

interests by two separate bodies were fully stated by President Timothy Dwight of Yale, on the occasion of his visit to Brunswick in 1807.¹

The existence of a large board with no power to originate, but with the right to negative the measures of a smaller body, renders the government, he says, "uncertain, prolix, and indecisive, furnishes room for the operation of multiplied personal interests, prejudices, intrigues, and unfortunate compromises; and, generally prevents the order, energy and decision, attendant upon a single board. A body of Overseers, occasionally called together to meddle with the affairs of the college, will usually feel so little interest in them, except at the moment, as never to be in possession of the system intended to be pursued; the wisdom and expediency of one part of which will often depend more on its relation to the other parts, than on its own nature. Often they will not come together, at all, in such numbers as to form a quorum; and will thus prevent the accomplishment of the business for which they were summoned. The very numbers of which they consist, will of course include many, who are incompetent judges of academical concerns, and many more, who will never take pains to inquire into their nature, or to possess themselves of that judgment, which their capacity would in better circumstances enable them to form. Their decisions, therefore, will often be sudden; often crude, and not unfrequently hostile to the very interests, which they would wish to promote. To secure the prosperity of such an institution, it is indispensably necessary, that a system, embracing all its interests for a considerable period at least, should be carefully formed and closely pursued. All, who are to vote, should distinctly understand this system; and, whenever they come to act, should have it fully in their minds; so as to comprehend readily the relation, which every new measure has to the general scheme, and its proper influence on measures already adopted. This can be done, only by a long continued, and minute acquaintance with the affairs of the institution; and can never be done by men, who, occupied busily in totally different concerns, come rarely and casually, to the consideration of these. The votes of such men will be governed by the impulse of the moment; by whim; by prejudice; by attachment to a friend, or a party; and sometimes, not improbably, by the mere fact, that their duty requires them to vote, when perhaps, they are wholly at a loss whether the vote, actually given, will be useful or mischievous. If such a system be not so pursued; the interests of a public seminary can never become prosperous, unless by accident, or by the peculiarly meritorious labours of a wise and vigorous Faculty; overcoming many disadvantages, and preventing with uncommon prudence, and felicity, the mischievous effects of indigested, desultory regulations."

The evils foreseen and described above have been realized on several occasions. Fortunately, during the decades in which they were most noticeable, they were more than neutralized by the loyal and efficient group of men who then formed the teaching force and whose customary title for many years was "the executive government."

At the outset, what might seem to be a lack of interest in the infant institution was displayed in the lower Board. Of its forty-two members, one-third never attended a meeting. A few of these absentees were men whose names were included in the charter solely on the ground of official station. Most of them were kept away by the expense and difficulty of traveling or by the infirmities of age. In subsequent years, however, the number of overseers who have kept themselves informed as to the interests of the institution has been so large, and the assistance they have rendered so material, that a proposal made by a prominent alumnus in 1884 to do away with this Board received comparatively little approval.¹

Slow progress was made in the task of organizing the college. Eight years elapsed between the granting of the charter and the beginning of instruction. The two governing Boards had different theories as to the cause of this. The Overseers claimed that the Trustees were old and dilatory. The Trustees maintained that the lack of money was the root of all the evils under which the institution labored. Furthermore, if they were slow, the Overseers were obstinate.² The records seem to indicate that the latter were over-anxious to have their own way in the matter of the size and cost of the first building to be erected. For this purpose they were willing to dispose of two of the five townships granted by the state, and their repeated vetoes of the more cautious proposals of the Trustees delayed action. Again, some time was lost by the failure of each Board to obtain a quorum for one important special meeting to be held 25 August, 1795, at Brunswick.

² The dissatisfaction of the Overseers went so far as to lead them to petition the General Court to increase the number of Trustees. That body made a formal reply to the legislature, an abstract of which is given in Cleveland's History of Bowdoin College (p. 6), and the matter was apparently dropped.

The chief reason for this delay in organization was inability to realize a sufficient amount of money from the unproductive lands granted by the state. "There was much land in the market selling at twenty cents (an acre) and even lower, and it was difficult to sell at any price."¹ To sell the college townships for a lower price than such property had obtained in the past and was likely to secure in the future seemed an unwise course to the committee having the matter in charge. Fortunately, as the sequel proved, these conservative counsels prevailed. The five townships, the gift of the Commonwealth, were surveyed and formally transferred to the college, 25 February, 1796. They are now known as Dixmont, Sebec, Foxcroft, Guilford, and Abbot. The value of this amount of wild land, if estimated at the average price per acre received by the Commonwealth for other land sold in 1794, was $21,441.12.² The expenses of surveying and settling were considerable, and the losses from unfulfilled contracts not a few during a long series of years, yet the net amount realized from this charter endowment may be conservatively estimated at twenty-five thousand dollars, with interest at six per cent. from the very first.

In 1798, a beginning was made upon a "House for the use of the College." This house is now known as Massachusetts Hall. It was to be completed as soon as the Treasurer could pay the $2,400 appropriated for its erection. The site had been chosen two years before, when, on the 19 July, 1796, the Boards had held their first meeting at Brunswick and walked through the pine-covered plain just south of the village at Pejepscot Falls.

¹Letter of Hon. Alden Bradford to Nehemiah Cleveland, dated 3 February, 1835.

²It may be of interest to note that the state valuation in 1894 of these five towns is $1,525,120.

The thirty acres of land they selected for the campus had been given by Col. William Stanwood, John Dunlap, Esq., and Gen. Samuel Thompson, and two hundred acres additional had been transferred to the college by vote of the town. Unfortunately the market for wild land was even duller during the two following than it had been in the preceding years. The College Treasurer could not procure the cash needed to finish the hall "after the finishing of Hollis Hall in Cambridge." The walls erected in 1799 of brick brought from Portland, were provided with a temporary roof, and the building stood with its windows boarded up for two years. Repeated circulation of subscription papers had brought to the college only $800, and a considerable portion of this was in books. Discouraged, the Boards voted in 1800 to apply to the General Court for a grant of money to enable them to carry out the purposes of their organization. Nothing resulted from this.

The dawn of a brighter day was, however, close at hand. In 1801 the committee in charge of the college townships sold Dixmont for upwards of $20,000. In the same year they disposed of Foxcroft, which was smaller and much less favorably situated, for $7,940. Work was at once resumed upon Massachusetts Hall, and "by the spring of 1802, all the external conditions for opening the College,—accommodations for a president and family, rooms for students, for a chapel and hall, for lectures and recitations, for library and apparatus—were snugly and economically provided for within this single edifice."¹

CHAPTER II.

THE BOWDOINS.

The Huguenot ancestor—James Bowdoin, the merchant—Governor Bowdoin—His scientific and literary attainments—His political services—Hon. James Bowdoin, the patron of the College—His benefactions—His will—The contingent remainder—The Bowdoin Art Collections—Benefactions from other members of the family.

When Louis XIV signed the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he little thought he thus indirectly provided a name for a Protestant college to be established across the water a full century later. Pierre Bandonin, one of the Huguenot subjects of Le Grand Monarque, preferred a few acres of wild land on the shores of Casco Bay to his ancestral estate in the valley of the Sèvre when the latter could be retained only by the recantation of his religious beliefs. He is said to have been a physician by profession, and, on the testimony of his great-grandson, was the owner of landed property near Rochelle, which in 1685 "yielded the considerable income of 700 louis d'ors per annum."¹

Driven from France by religious persecution, after a short sojourn in Dublin, he landed at Casco, homeless and almost penniless, with his wife and four children in 1687. In that year he petitioned Sir Edmund Andros, then Governor-in-Chief of New England, for a grant of one hundred acres of unoccupied land at the point of Barbary Creek "to the end that he might have the means of supporting his family." The request was favorably considered, but before a warrant for its execution was issued, he had settled near what is now the corner of Emery and Spring streets in the city of Portland, and curiously enough within a few rods of the spot selected one hundred years later by the Rev. Dr. Samuel Deane for the site of the college that was to perpetuate his name. Here he remained for two years and a half, removing to Boston just in time to escape the capture of Falmouth by the French and Indians in May, 1690, and the subsequent massacre of the settlers. The remainder of his life was spent at Boston, where he was a prominent member of a French Protestant church, composed of fellow-refugees.

His son, James Bowdoin, became a merchant, and by his industry, integrity, and ability accumulated the largest fortune that had at that time been held by one person in Massachusetts. For several years before his death, which occurred in 1747, he occupied a seat in the Colonial Council. With him the family name assumed the English form now so familiar.

His son, Governor James Bowdoin, was born in Boston, August 7, 1726, received his early education under Master Lovell at the South Grammar School, and after the usual college course of that day took the degree of Bachelor of Arts at Harvard in 1745. His interest in scientific investigation early manifested itself. At the age of twenty-four he made the acquaintance of Benjamin Franklin, and began both a correspondence and a friendship that closed only with their lives. The American philosopher was then in the midst of his famous experiments in electricity. His estimate of the young man's ability is shown by his request for observations on the copy of "his electrical papers, fairly transcribed," which he sent him, and a few years later by withdrawing one of his hypotheses and writing, "I grow more doubtful of my former supposition, and more ready to allow weight to that objection which you have indeed stated with great strength and clearness." Many of Bowdoin's scientific letters were sent by Franklin to London, read before the Royal Society, and published with his own. Of them he writes: "It gives me great pleasure that my book afforded any to my friends. I esteem those letters of yours among its brightest ornaments, and have the satisfaction to find that they add greatly to the reputation of American philosophy."

To Governor Bowdoin was due, in great measure, the foundation of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. He was chosen its first president, an office which he held to his death, contributed to its proceedings, and bequeathed to it his private library of twelve hundred volumes, covering all branches of science then known. His attainments were recognized on both sides of the Atlantic. He received an election to the Royal Society of Great Britain, the degree of doctor of laws from the University of Edinburgh, and also from his Alma Mater and the University of Pennsylvania.

While his natural bent was unquestionably towards physical science, he showed a fondness for literature. Three of the pieces in the elaborate "Pietas et Gratulatio," sent by Harvard College to George III on his accession to the throne, came from his pen. A more successful courting of the muse of poetry was his "Paraphrase on a part of the Economy of Human Life," published anonymously in 1759.

It is natural to find him a patron of education. When Harvard lost its library by fire, in 1764, he contributed liberally to its restoration; he added to its scientific apparatus "an elegant and valuable orrery"; he served as a fellow of the corporation for several years; and by his will he established a fund for the encouragement of polite literature. Upon this foundation, now amounting to upwards of $13,000, the Bowdoin Prizes for English Dissertations have been regularly awarded for a long series of years. He was active in organizing the Massachusetts Humane Society, and served as its president for a long period.

It was not, however, by his scientific attainments and philanthropic disposition that Governor Bowdoin won the high place he held in the estimation of his generation. It was his fortune to live at a period when political affairs demanded thought and action on the part of every true-hearted citizen. It is to his honor that his study of the political situation, carried on thoroughly, conscientiously, and boldly, led him to choose the party of American independence, a party which, though possessed of several leaders of equal ability, had none of his wealth and social standing. He entered political life as a representative from Boston at the age of twenty-seven, and took an active part in preparing measures to resist the encroachments of the French. He was especially interested in the union of the colonies proposed by his friend, Franklin, at the Albany Convention of 1754. In the rough draft of a speech, delivered by him in the colonial legislature, occur these words: "If the Colonies were united, they could easily drive the French out of this part of America; but, in a disunited state, the French, though not a tenth part so numerous, are an overmatch for them all. They are under one head and one direction, and all pull one way: whereas the Colonies have no head, some of them are under no direction in military matters, and all pull different ways. Join or die must be their motto."

In 1757 he was chosen a member of the Council, or upper house of the colonial legislature, and was annually re-elected for the next seventeen years. Here he took part in all the discussions of the prolonged controversy between the British Ministry and the Colony, and drafted a large part of those state papers which, as a distinguished descendant has said, "originally and gradually prepared the popular heart for the great issue of independence." He was styled the leader and manager of the Council, as Samuel Adams was of the House. The royal governor writes of him: "Bowdoin greatly encouraged, if he did not first propose (as a measure of retaliation for the arbitrary taxes imposed by Great Britain) the association for leaving off the custom of mourning dress for the loss of deceased friends: and for wearing, on all occasions, the common manufactures of the country." In 1774 his election to the Council, which had once before been vetoed by the royal governor, was again negatived by General Gage, acting in accordance with express orders from His Majesty George III. The same year he was chosen first on the list of delegates to represent Massachusetts at the First Continental Congress at Philadelphia. Had not the serious illness of his wife and the partial failure of his own health kept him at home, his name would probably have held the prominent place on the Declaration of Independence now occupied by that of his substitute, John Hancock. In 1775 he was elected a member and chosen president of the Provincial Council, a body which exercised supreme authority in the colony. This position brought him into personal relations with Washington, which resulted in an intimate acquaintance and a lasting friendship. In 1779 he served as presiding officer of the convention that framed the constitution of the commonwealth, and also as chairman of the select committee that framed the first draft. Under this constitution he was offered by the first legislature the position of lieutenant-governor and also that of senator. He declined each, but accepted, a few months later, membership on the commission to revise and codify the laws of the state.

In 1785 he was chosen Governor, and re-elected the following year. His administration was rendered noteworthy by his efforts to secure an increase of the powers of the Continental Congress, so that it might regulate trade with foreign nations and raise a revenue for the public credit, a measure he had advocated thirty years before in the Albany Convention. Among the many steps that terminated in the formation of the federal constitution, few were more important than the strong resolutions passed by Massachusetts in 1785 at the suggestion and earnest recommendation of Governor Bowdoin. Still more noteworthy was his action at the time of Shays' rebellion. The firmness and the wisdom he displayed in putting down this insurrection at the cost of much personal unpopularity have established with posterity his reputation as a far-sighted and unselfish patriot. It was a critical period. Debt and discontent were everywhere rife, and the triumph of law and order in Massachusetts meant the triumph of the same principles in the other states.

After retiring from the chief magistracy, Governor Bowdoin was again called to exert his influence in the convention assembled in 1788 to ratify the constitution of the United States, in which he served as a delegate from Boston as did his son from Dorchester. With the following words, with which he closed his formal speech for its adoption, this sketch of his political career can well close :

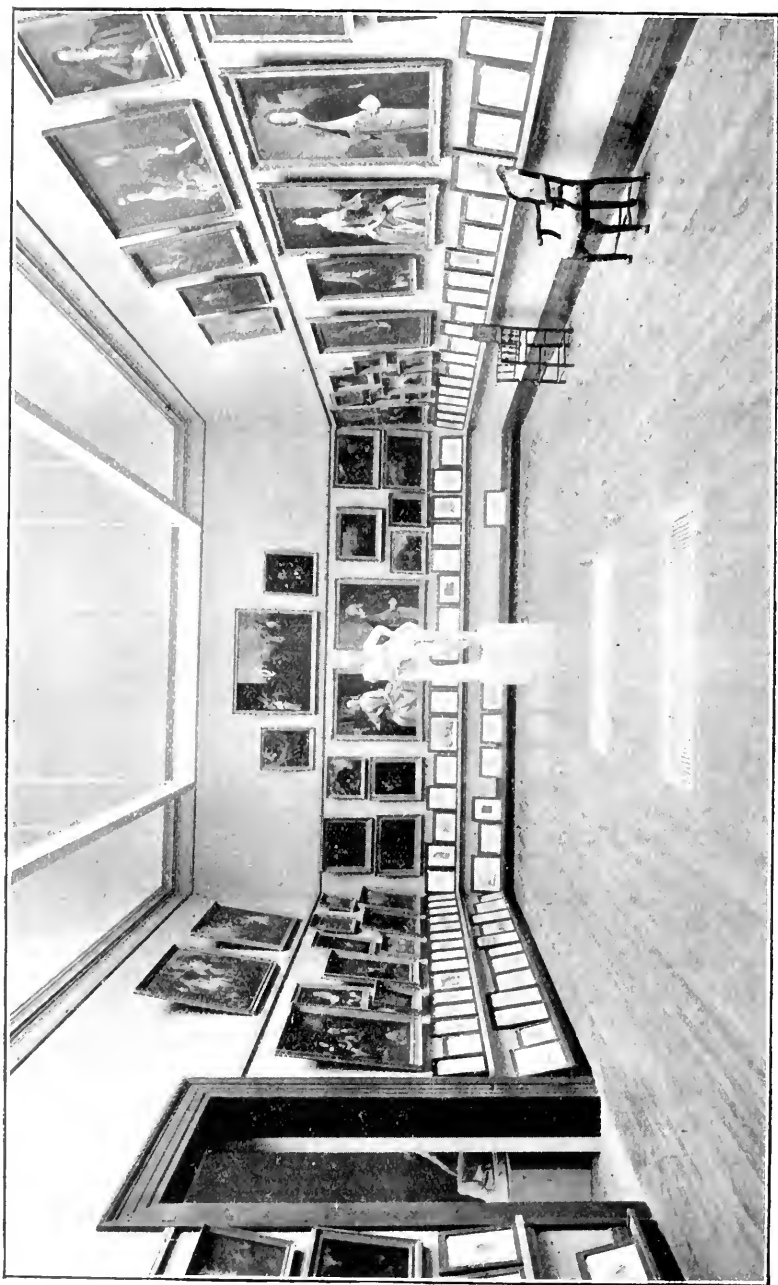

"If the constitution should be finally accepted and established, it will complete the temple of American liberty, and, like the keystone of a grand and magnificent arch, be the bond of union to keep all the parts firm and compacted together. May this temple, sacred to liberty and virtue,—sacred to justice, the first and greatest political virtue, and built upon the broad and solid foundation of perfect union—be dissoluble only by the dissolution of nature!

and may this convention have the distinguished honor of erecting one of its pillars on that lasting foundation."

Governor Bowdoin's health, never robust, failed rapidly in the fall of 1790, and he died on November sixth of that year. Of his many eulogists one has described his character as truthfully as forcefully, in the sentence: "It may be said that our country has produced many men of as much genius; many men of as much learning and knowledge; many of as much zeal for the liberties of their country; and many of as much piety and virtue; but is it not rare indeed to find those in whom they have all combined and been adorned with his other accomplishments?"

The death of this man amid wide-spread sorrow on the part of the people, seems to have brought the friends of the proposed college in the District of Maine to a decision as to its name. With genuine New England shrewdness, however, one of them procured an introduction to the only son of the late governor, mentioned the proposed action, and made natural suggestions as to the interest shown in learning by the family in the past, and the many needs of a new institution. Mr. James Bowdoin, as a descendant of the interviewer writes, heard him through without objection, but made no promises. Subsequently, however, assurance was given that the new college should have aid from the family, though the assurance was coupled with the caution that too much must not be expected.

Hon. James Bowdoin, the third to bear this name, and the patron of the college, was graduated at Harvard in 1771, studied law ten months at the University at Oxford, and spent nearly the same time in travel in England. After a short stay at home, he again crossed the Atlantic, mainly on account of his health, which was always delicate, spent some time in Italy, and was on his way to England when the news of the Battle of Lexington called him home. He was anxious to enter the army, but his parents' health, not to mention his own, seemed to forbid. He was with General Washington, however, when the latter entered Boston in March, 1776, and took his commander to dine at his grandfather Erving's, where the best the town could afford was placed before them in a piece of salted beef. Mr. Bowdoin entered political life as a representative to the legislature from Dorchester in 1786. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention in 1788, and also served in the state senate and the governor's council. In 1804 he received a commission from President Jefferson as Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of Spain. He was subsequently made associate minister with General Armstrong to the Court of France. His stay abroad, though not successful in the object especially before him—compensation for repeated spoliations of American commerce—was indirectly of the greatest benefit to the college, the needs of which he seems constantly to have had in mind. Ill health caused his return in 1808, and three years later, October 11, 1811, he died suddenly at his favorite residence on the island of Naushon in Buzzard's Bay.

At the first meeting of the Trustees of the college at Portland, December 3, 1794, a letter was read from Mr. Bowdoin, expressing his appreciation of the respect shown his father's memory in the name chosen for the college, and announcing a gift of one thousand dollars in specie and one thousand acres of land in Bowdoinham. The land was valued by the recipients at $3,000. The next year another communication was received, transferring to the college a well-secured mortgage for nearly three thousand dollars, and asking that it might be employed for the endowment of a professorship of mathematics and natural and experimental philosophy, the interest being added to the principal until a professor was chosen. Mr. Bowdoin was urged to accept the position of President of the Board of Overseers, but declined owing to the difficulty of regularly attending the meetings at Brunswick. His interest, as well as his confidence in the institution, appears from the fact that his grand-nephew and heir, James (Winthrop) Bowdoin, was sent to the "down-east" college rather than to Cambridge. Shortly before his death, Mr. Bowdoin transferred to the college a large tract of land in the town of Lisbon, embracing about six thousand acres.

Though these gifts, made during his life-time, may not seem large at the present day, their importance to the infant institution can hardly be over-estimated. By his will there came to the college at once several valuable collections and, eventually, a considerable sum of money. Two clauses of this will are here printed in order to show the ground for the peculiar, but unquestionably just, claim the college advanced thirty years later :

Fifthly. I give and devise unto my nephew James Temple Bowdoin for and during the term of his natural life my Mansion House in Beacon Street in said Boston and the furniture of the drawing-room therein with the Stables and Land unto said Mansion House belonging, Also all my Islands Lands Farms & Estate in Chilmark in the County of Dukes Comty in said Commonwealth with the Houses, buildings, Stores, Salt works and appurtenances, farming Tools and Stock of every kind on said Lands & estate with the furniture in the Houses on said Lands, also my right and estate in a piece of land held in common with Joseph Parker containing about three Acres more or less lying within Woods hole neck, To hold what I have thus given and devised to said James Temple Bowdoin for and during the term of his natural life and from and after the determination of that estate by forfeiture or otherwise I give the same to Thomas Lindall Winthrop and Richard Sullivan of said Boston Esquires and to their heirs in trust only to preserve and support the contingent remainders and uses herein after limited from being defeated barred or destroyed; and for that purpose from time to time and at all times to make entries and bring Actions as occasion may require nevertheless to permit and suffer the said James Temple Bowdoin to receive the rents issues and profits thereof for and during the term of his natural life, and from and immediately after his decease, I give and devise all the foregoing estates so given to him for life, unto and to the use and behoof of the first son lawfully begotten or to be begotten of the said James Temple Bowdoin, and the heirs male of the Body of such first son lawfully issuing; and for default of such issue to the use and behoof of the second, third, and all other son and sons of said James Temple Bowdoin and the heirs male of the body or bodies of such second third and other son or sons lawfully begotten or to be begotten severally and successively as they shall be in seniority of age and priority of birth that is to say, the oldest of such son and sons and the heirs male of his and their body and bodies being always to be preferred before the youngest of such son and sons and the heirs male of his and their body and bodies lawfully to be begotten and for default of such issue then I give and devise said estates so given to said James Temple Bowdoin for life unto my other nephew James Bowdoin Winthrop now of Harvard College¹ in ¹The proper correction, Bowdoin College in Brunswick, is made at the close of the document before it was signed.

Cambridge, he dropping the name of Winthrop, for and during the term of his natural Life and from and immediately after the determination of that his estate by forfeiture or otherwise, I give and devise the same unto said Thomas Lindal Winthrop and Richard Sullivan and to their heirs in trust only to preserve and support the contingent remainders and uses herein after limited from being defeated, barred or destroyed, and for that purpose from time to time to make entries, but to suffer said James Bowdoin Winthrop to receive the rents and profits thereof during the term of his natural life and at his decease I give and devise the same Mansion House and lands in Boston and Islands and estates (described in the devise to said James Temple) unto and to the use and behoof of the first son lawfully begotten of said James Bowdoin Winthrop and the heirs male of the body of such first son lawfully issuing and for default of such issue to the use of the second third and other sons of said James Bowdoin Winthrop and the heirs male of the body of each of them in succession & manner as before limited to the male issue of said James Temple, and for default of any such male issue of said James Temple and of said James Bowdoin Winthrop then I give and devise the said Estates in Boston and in the County of Dukes County and Woods hole, with their Stock furniture and appurtenances before described unto the aforesaid Bowdoin College in fee simple forever.

Sixthly. I give and devise to my said Nephew James Temple Bowdoin and to his heirs in fee simple my Estate in State Street and Kilby Street formerly called the Bunch of Grapes Tavern, also my Brick House and small Brick tenements in Back Street and Richmond Street all in said Boston, and all the foregoing gifts and devises which I have thus made to him are under the hope and expectation that he will return to and continue to be a Citizen of the United States.

Of the two nephews selected by Mr. Bowdoin to hold his landed estates and maintain the family name, one, Mr. James (Winthrop) Bowdoin died unmarried in 1833. Ten years before, the college had sold him its contingent remainder in valuable lands on the Kennebec for $2,000, all that it seemed, but, unfortunately, only a fraction of what it proved, to be worth. The other, Mr. James Temple Bowdoin, continued to live abroad with his family. At his death in 1842, President Woods was led to believe that the patron of the college, a strong Jeffersonian democrat, never intended any of his property should be held abroad by British subjects, and his study of the law of contingent remainders convinced him that the college could now justly advance its claims as residuary legatee. After consultation with eminent lawyers, he had this course pursued in spite of the lukewarmness of some of the Trustees, themselves jurists of eminence, and of popular disapproval in Boston of the particular steps taken to bring the matter before the courts. The case, however, was never tried. A compromise was proposed by the heirs of Mr. James Temple Bowdoin, and, in accordance with its terms, $31,696 was received by the college.¹

In accordance with the provisions of the will, the college received at once Mr. Bowdoin's library. This consisted of upwards of two thousand volumes and of as many pamphlets. The books were largely purchased abroad, and were evidently chosen with much personal care and thought. The collection was especially strong in French literature and history, in science and agriculture, and in international law. In mineralogy it seems to have included almost everything in print. The works in English literature are well selected, but the absence of poetry is noticeable. If Greek and Latin poets, and Shakespeare, Milton, and Pope are excluded, hardly one volume is found where one might expect a dozen. Among the more expensive sets may be mentioned Bulliard, Herbier de la France, Le Moniteur Universel, 1789-1807, Tableaux Historiques de la Revolution Française, Memoires de l'Institut National, and the first American edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica. The library was appraised at $5,362.26. Time has made queer work with some of the values assigned by the appraisers. The "131 bundles of pamphlets in number about 2117" contained some of the rare tracts on American history now so diligently sought for, and their market value to-day, instead of being one-twentieth, might well exceed that of the books.

With the library came the Haüy collection of minerals valued at $100, models in crystallography valued at $200, and other scientific apparatus appraised at an equal amount. The following chapter will show the influence these exerted on the character of the instruction in science in the college.

¹A fuller account of this transaction is given in Cleaveland's History of Bowdoin College, p. 108. The reader, however, should be cautioned against one sentence so unfortunately worded as to seem to reflect upon the honor of a most loyal Trustee of the college.

Of far greater value, though of less immediate service, were the seventy paintings and one hundred and forty-two drawings, bequeathed to the college with the library. Mr. Bowdoin in his repeated visits to Europe seems to have developed a love for art which his last residence in Paris gave him an excellent opportunity to gratify. Unfortunately no memoranda are extant of the many purchases he made there. No catalogue from his own hand exists, or appears to have existed at his death, of a collection then considered the finest in this country, and which still holds a most prominent place among those possessed by American colleges. The inventory furnished by the executors identifies each picture by its subject but fails to give the name of the painter except in case of twenty-two canvases. These belong mainly to the Dutch school and include good examples of Wouwermans, Hondelkötter, Berghem, Van Balen, and Michael Carré. The Flemish school is represented by originals or fine copies of Rubens, Vandyck, and Teniers; the French school by originals by Stella, Patel, Manglard, and Laroix; the Italian school by a Salvator Rosa and by copies from Raphael, Titian, and Guido Reni. Portraits of Thomas Jefferson and James Madison, painted by Gilbert Stuart at Mr. Bowdoin's special request, are admirable specimens of American art. The Bowdoin family portraits which were received at later date include good examples of the work of Robert Feke, John Singleton Copley, and possibly of John Smibert.

Less known to most graduates of the college, because not till recently arranged for public exhibition, is the collection of one hundred and forty-two drawings by old masters. These, there is reason to surmise, were bought at one time from an expert collector. In inherent worth as well as in representative character they form a collection that is surpassed by only one or two on this side of the Atlantic. Among the famous artists represented are Titian, Domenichino, Claude Lorraine, Poussin, and Rembrandt.¹

¹A series of photogravures of some of the drawings and paintings, edited by Rev. Frederic H. Allen, was issued in 1886 and is still sold by the college librarian. It is also proposed to issue reproductions in color of the choicest drawings.

This account of the Bowdoin benefactions would be incomplete without brief allusion to the interest taken in the college by the ladies of the family. Madame Elizabeth Bowdoin, the widow of Governor Bowdoin, requested President McKeen to indicate what books were needed at the opening of the institution in 1802, and these to the value of five hundred dollars were immediately purchased in England and delivered at Brunswick free of all expense. Mrs. Sarah Bowdoin at about the same time presented an elegant time-piece. To her subsequent gift of one thousand dollars for the foundation of a professorship of modern languages is due in great measure the prominent position early awarded that subject in the college curriculum, and the addition to the Faculty of one of its most honored names, Henry W. Longfellow.

PRESIDENT McKEEN'S ADMINISTRATION.

At a special meeting held in July, 1801, Rev. Joseph McKeen was chosen president of the college.¹ President McKeen was born at Londonderry, N. H., October 15, 1757, and inherited from his Scotch-Irish ancestry a strong constitution and vigorous and athletic body. He was graduated at Dartmouth at seventeen, taught in his native town for eight years, and then, after a brief course in natural philosophy and astronomy at Harvard, gave himself to the study of theology under Rev. Mr. Williams, of Windham, N. H. In 1785 he was called to the pastorate of the church at Beverly, Mass., which had been made vacant by the elevation of Rev. Dr. Willard to the presidency of Harvard. This position he had filled for seventeen years with great acceptableness. He brought to the college the reputation of a sound divine, an able scholar, and a polished gentleman, and these qualities, with his keen and discriminating judgment, rendered his brief administration of highest value.

John Abbot, a graduate of Harvard in 1784 and for five years a tutor there, was chosen the first professor of ancient languages. His long and faithful service in the various capacities of professor, librarian, and treasurer, has been very fitly marked by the giving of his name to one of the college townships. His reputation as a Greek scholar was won in the last century; it was to the zeal and fidelity he displayed as a business man, that the college owes most.

President McKean's acceptance of his election had been conditioned on the erection of a dwelling-house for the use of himself and family. Availing himself of the consequent delay, he visited in the summer of 1802, in company with Professor Abbot, Cambridge, Providence, New Haven, and Williamstown, to acquaint himself from actual inspection with the modes of government and the course of instruction pursued in the New England colleges. With a wise boldness he adopted the same qualifications for admission that were then required at Harvard. These were a knowledge of the principles of the Latin and Greek languages, the ability to translate English into Latin, to read the Select Orations of Cicero, the Æneid of Virgil, and an acquaintance with arithmetic as far as the rule of three. The young college stood in this respect in advance of others older and wealthier.

In September, 1802, the president and the senior professor were formally inaugurated into their new positions. The ceremony took place in the pine grove that still occupies part of the campus: for no building at hand was large enough to accommodate the assemblage which the long-desired opening of the college had attracted from different parts of the state. The scene must have been an impressive one, when, at the close of a brief address, in which he had set forth simply and plainly the purpose and the policy of the institution, President McKean besought all present to unite in the prayer that the new seminary might "eminently contribute to the advancement of useful knowledge, the religion of Jesus Christ, the best interests of man, and the glory of God." The next day, eight young men, of whom two were from Beverly, Mass., were admitted, and college work began in the newly-completed Massachusetts Hall. The President's house was not entirely finished, and for a few weeks one roof covered both Faculty and students, while the President's study served as chapel and recitation room. Of the exact course of study pursued by these young men, or rather boys, for only two of them were sixteen, no definite statement seems to be extant. There is little doubt, however, that it was similar to that pursued a few years later and outlined below.

Latin, Greek, and Mathematics were studied almost continuously during the first three years, Horace, Juvenal, and Cicero being the Latin authors read, while Dalzel's Collectanea Græca Majora and Webber's Mathematics were the bulky text-books that supplied material for study in the other two branches. Rhetoric and elocution were taught by exercises throughout most of the course. Geography was a Freshman, logic a Sophomore, and Locke on the Human Understanding, a Junior study. Paley's Evidences of Christianity, Butler's Analogy of Religion, Stewart's Elements of the Philosophy of the Mind, Priestley's Lectures on History, Burlamaqui's Natural Law, Enfield's Natural Philosophy, and Chaptal's Chemistry were text-books used during the Senior year. As a rule, college recitations were literally recitations. The words of the author and not of the learner were sought. In the classics, construing, i. e., giving the equivalent of each word rather than translating into connected sentences, was everywhere in vogue. President McKeen evinced a disposition to break away from the old methods, as may be inferred from the following account by one of the first pupils:

“As a teacher in mathematics he was lucid, and uncommonly successful in his illustrations. The exemplification of abstract propositions by models has been introduced into modern practice; but at the time referred to, it was, if at all, very sparingly used. With Dr. McKeen it was a familiar custom. Some of the properties of conic sections, in particular, were so illustrated. As a teacher of historical science, he evinced a philosophic mind and generalized its lessons with happy effect and useful results. As a teacher of intellectual and moral philosophy he exhibited a thorough comprehension of his subject and was felicitous in gathering illustrations from actual life. . . . Dr. McKeen had eminent administrative and gubernatorial talent. He very highly estimated the efficiency of what is termed “moral suasion,” but probably never dreamed of its being the exclusive means of government. He never mistook men for angels.”¹

If consideration be had of their limited resources, it is clear that the Trustees pursued at the outset a liberal policy in regard to salaries and apparatus. President McKen received one thousand dollars a year, the use of the President's house erected for him at an expense of about $2,500, and one thousand acres of the wild land which made up in such large measure the collegiate endowment. His salary was soon increased to $1,200 and that of the first professor who was unmarried raised to $800. President Willard of Harvard received only $1,400, while the expense of living in Cambridge was much greater, as will appear from the following extract from a pamphlet advocating the separation of Maine and dedicated to Rev. Dr. Samuel Deane, the vice-president of the Trustees: "But in order to shew that the sum of £300 (equivalent to $1,000) is ample for the support of a Governour, it may be said that there is no part of the District where that sum regularly paid and economically expended will not support a family in as good a style as will be consistent with the present state of society in this part of the country. The refinements of luxury in this wooden world would be ridiculous."

Steps were taken early for the formation of a library, and the collection numbered nearly five hundred volumes at the opening of the college for instruction. Madame Bowdoin's timely gift added greatly to its efficiency as well as to its size. In 1803 the Trustees appropriated one thousand dollars for the increase of the library and a thousand more for apparatus. The college already possessed a valuable air-pump, costing $300 and given by several gentlemen of Salem, an equatorial, and other astronomical apparatus. To these were added within a few years a telescope valued at $500, the gift of Hon. William Phillips of Boston, the electrical, chemical, and mineralogical apparatus of Hon. James Bowdoin, with his elaborate collection of minerals and models in crystallography. These, with the purchases made from the appropriation referred to, enabled the young college to claim during the first quarter of the century that only Harvard surpassed it in equipment for the study of science.

On the admission of a third class in 1804, Mr. Samuel Willard, a recent graduate of Harvard and for many years afterward pastor of the church at Deerfield, Mass., was engaged as a tutor. For the next two decades the practice was followed of increasing the body of instructors by the annual appointment of one or more tutors, who lived in the college buildings and were expected to exercise personal influence upon the students and maintain control over those who showed themselves unruly. Among those who thus served the college and unquestionably left the impress of their character and scholarship upon many of the early graduates, were the gentlemen afterwards known as Rev. Dr. Benjamin Tappan of Augusta, Prof. Andrews Norton of Harvard College, and Rev. Dr. Nathan Parker of Portsmouth, N. H.

The punishments inflicted for misbehavior during this administration and the two following were fines, public admonition, and suspension. The first were imposed for neglect of college duties and minor irregularities. The second was employed when private reproofs and warnings seemed without avail. Suspension or rustication was always for a considerable period of time. The culprit was required to reside with and be instructed by a clergyman selected by the Faculty. The result was usually a change in the character of the young man or his permanent separation from the institution. The public admonition given in the chapel before the student body was so characteristic of the day in its formality, that the following extract from the records of the Faculty is cited to convey a clear idea of it :

At a meeting of the executive government of Bowdoin College 2 April 1805, present, the President, Messrs. Abbot and Willard. On examination, it appeared that A. B. and C. D. had been guilty of repeated acts of violence committed on each other under the influence of ungoverned passion, therefore, Voted, that the said A. B. and C. D. be publicly admonished for the same.

Voted, that their names and offenses be entered on the record.

The following admonition was accordingly administered.

It is with pain that we find ourselves under a necessity of calling you forward in the presence of your fellow-students to be reprov'd and admonish'd for the repeated acts of violence into which you have suffer'd yourselves to be hurried by ungovern'd passion. We did indulge a hope that the remembrance of the disgraceful scene exhibited by you on the fourth of last July and the parental admonition then given you, would have had a better effect. We are sorry to say we are disappointed and that we have perceived less indication of remorse or penitence in this instance than in that. We earnestly recommend to your serious consideration the solemn warning in the first verse of the twenty-ninth chapter of Proverbs, 'He that being often reproved hardeneth his neck, shall be suddenly destroyed and that without remedy.'

You can not plead in extenuation of your last offence, that it was the effect of a sudden impulse, which allowed you no time for reflection. After your anger was kindled but before you proceeded to acts of violence it might have been hoped that the ringing of the bell for prayers and your attendance at the devotional exercises in the chapel would have awakened different sentiments in your breast; but it appears that immediately after prayers you walked deliberately together into the woods, where, as your faces show, your treatment of each other resembled that of savage beasts much more than of Christians or young gentlemen who are receiving a liberal education. Tenderness to you and your friends heretofore restrained us from entering your names and offences upon the college records, but in this instance we think you have no right to that indulgence. The aggravations of this offence would in our opinion have clearly justified us in suspending for a time your connection with the college; but, as our object is your reformation not your infamy, we were unwilling to inflict so public a censure, till a fair experiment was made of the more private methods of discipline. That we engage the co-operation of your parents, we have thought it our duty to acquaint them with your behavior. Should their endeavors and ours prove ineffectual, we shall be under the painful necessity of banishing you for a time from the society of your fellow-students, lest your example should corrupt their morals and tarnish the reputation of this infant seminary.

We feel it to be our duty to exhort you to repentance, and we pray God to work in you sincere contrition for this and all your sins, to clothe you with humility, and to put upon you the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, that, putting away all bitterness and wrath, and anger, and clamor and evil speaking, ye may be followers of God, as dear children, and walk in love as Christ loved us and gave himself for us.

The year 1805 was marked by the establishment of the chair of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy, and the inauguration of Parker Cleaveland as its occupant. Professor Cleaveland was graduated at Harvard in 1799, and his success as a tutor at Cambridge led to his appointment at Brunswick. His attention was early directed towards mineralogy and chemistry, and these two sciences in succession won his complete devotion, and the teaching of them before long required his entire energies. Lectures upon chemistry and mineralogy became a part of the collegiate course of study as early as 1808. In 1816 he issued his Elementary Treatise on Mineralogy and Geology, which embodied the subject matter of his lectures and the results of several years of indefatigable study with the best helps then available. This book put him at once in the front rank of American mineralogists. It combined the excellences of the French and German theories as to the classification of rocks, presented the labors of European mineralogists in attractive form, added new species and localities, and thus began to pay the heavy debt in science which America owed Europe. The commendation it received from fellow-scientists on both sides of the ocean was warm and hearty. Silliman's Journal of Science and Arts ends a long review with: "In our opinion this work does honor to our country and will greatly promote the knowledge of mineralogy and geology, besides aiding in the great work of disseminating a taste for science generally." The Edinburgh Review styled it "the most useful work on mineralogy in our language." It was used by Dr. Clarke, Professor of Mineralogy in the University of Cambridge, and was employed as a text-book in all American colleges where the study was pursued. Humboldt, while in London, borrowed the copy belonging to the Geological Society, whose collection was arranged according to its system, and carried it home with him. Goethe, in one of his miscellanies, coupled his name with that of a German geologist and extended a kind salutation. As many as sixteen scientific societies abroad and in this country added his name to their membership rolls. He received more or less formal offers of professorships from Harvard, Princeton, the University of Pennsylvania, and the University of Virginia, in several cases at more than double his salary at Bowdoin, which began at $800 and never exceeded $1,200 and house rent. His attachment to the college and his dislike of change, a marked characteristic of the man, led to the refusal of proposals which others would have eagerly grasped. The book which had so quickly brought to the attention of the world the character of the scientific instruction in the Maine college passed through a second edition in 1822, and then was, so to speak, abandoned by its parent.

On the establishment of the Medical School, in 1820, Professor Cleveland was appointed professor of chemistry and materia medica, and secretary of the Medical Faculty. These new duties involved the extension of his course in chemistry, and added much administrative detail to the work of instruction. They led him to gradually neglect his former favorite science, and to devote most of his time and attention to chemistry and the interests of the new school. Henceforth, teaching and not research engrossed his energies. His chemical lectures, of which a full account is given in a later chapter, were delivered with clock-like regularity in Massachusetts Hall. This alone remains of the three college buildings completed in this administration. Though the interior and the roof have been twice remodeled and rebuilt, the exterior as portrayed in the earliest view of the college campus will seem familiar to the latest graduate. The belfry that then adorned it was removed when the old chapel was enlarged in 1818. The first floor now contains the offices of the college treasurer and the Cleveland recitation room. In the corner of the latter may be still seen the old brick fire-place with its iron crane and several pieces of the rude apparatus used by the teacher who met his classes here for half a century. It is a coincidence worthy, perhaps, of mention that his apparatus for the manufacture of gases came from Dr. Beddoes' Pneumatic Institution at Bristol, and was made while Sir Humphrey Davy, then a youth, was acting as assistant there. The latter, grown to manhood and to fame, was one of the first to congratulate Professor Cleveland on his labors in mineralogy. The two original upper stories of the building have been thrown into a single hall, called the Cleveland Cabinet, forty-eight feet in length by thirty-eight feet in width and twenty-three feet in height. A gallery, reached by spiral staircases, surrounds the room. Fourteen alcoves and many large cases on the main floor contain the collection of minerals he made, as well as several other scientific collections belonging to the college. A projection on the east side provides a spacious entrance and staircase. On ascending, the visitor notes two interesting autographs—the last letter Professor Cleaveland wrote and the sonnet to his memory by his old-time student, Longfellow.

At the close of the first chapel service which was held in this building, George Thorndike, the youngest of the little group of students, half carelessly, half purposely, planted an acorn by the door-way. The next year, somewhat to his surprise, he found it had grown into a tiny shrub which he transplanted in the President's garden. Here it has slowly, but steadily, grown, and for many years successive classes have held their farewell exercises beneath its boughs. It stands, not only as a memorial of that youth who was the first to die of a long line of graduates, but also as an emblem of the progress of the institution which has often suffered from the lack of material resources just as the tree has felt the natural poverty of the soil that sustains it.

The Thorndike Oak also serves to mark the position of the two wooden buildings which were erected under President McKeen, but were long since destroyed. The dwelling-house, built for him and also occupied by his two successors, stood between the tree and Main Street. From it a plank walk extended to the old chapel which then faced the west and was a few rods to the south-east of the oak. The chapel was at first only intended to be a temporary structure and, though afterwards enlarged and surmounted with a belfry, never was provided with adequate facilities for heating. The second story was the home of the college library until the completion of King Chapel. The insufficient accommodation it afforded cramped, if it did not check, the normal growth of the collection.

If tradition may be trusted the first Commencement, which occurred in September of 1806, was a most notable event in the social life of the District of Maine. The college Boards, which included those most prominent in the professions and in official station, were present as a matter of course. Visitors who came from as far as Boston and vicinity in their private carriages, gave an appearance of wealth and importance to the little village with its sandy roads that it had never known before. At the close of the exercises diplomas were conferred on the seven young men who had completed the course, and the ad eundem degree of bachelor or master of arts upon fourteen recent graduates of Harvard, Yale, and Dartmouth, who had expressed the desire to become connected with the new institution. The festivities of the occasion were somewhat interrupted by the most violent storm of a series of years. In the darkness and confusion incident to the return from the Commencement ball, Gen. Henry Knox's fine equipage, with its load of ladies and gentlemen, was upset in the mire.

The first was also the last Commencement at which President McKeen presided. A painful and lingering disease which kept him from his college duties for several months terminated his life 15 July, 1807. His brief administration must be deemed remarkably successful, if consideration be had of the difficulties under which he labored. Among the forty-four students he matriculated, were Nathan Lord, for thirty-five years president of Dartmouth College, Charles Stewart Davis, prominent as a lawyer and polished orator, and two members of the legal profession who represented the commonwealth in the National Congress.

CHAPTER IV.

PRESIDENT APPLETON'S ADMINISTRATION.

Rev. Jesse Appleton—Bible study—College discipline—Maine Hall—State aid—Commons—The President as a teacher—Professorship of English and Hebrew—Other instructors—Student societies—Religious life—President Appleton's death—Political antagonism to the college.

To fill the vacancy caused by President McKean's death, the Trustees selected one of their own number, Hon. Isaac Parker, afterwards chief justice of Massachusetts and for a number of years professor in Harvard University. Judge Parker had been active in college affairs, especially in the sale of the wild lands, was a man of scholarly tastes and well qualified for the position: but his election was negatived by the lower Board. The Trustees then chose Rev. Eliphalet Nott, who had just begun his long and famous administration of Union College. He, too, was rejected by the Overseers. The third selection was Rev. Jesse Appleton, then pastor at Hampton, N. H., and this was approved by the other Board.

President Appleton was born 17 November, 1772, at New Ipswich, N. H., graduated at Dartmouth in 1792, and studied theology with Dr. Joseph Lathrop, of West Springfield, Mass. While yet a young man he had won a reputation for ability and scholarship, and had been a prominent candidate for the Hollis professorship at Harvard. Of the esteem in which his parishioners held him, evidence is given in the curious claim they made upon the college to be pecuniarily reimbursed for the loss of their pastor. Though not a controversialist, President Appleton was a leader on the evangelical side in the division that was then beginning to separate the Congregational churches of New England. He brought to the president's chair a sense of personal responsibility for the moral, religious, and intellectual welfare of the young men connected with the institution which many would characterize as morbid, and which certainly led to excessive labor and anxiety. In his inaugural address, delivered in December, 1807, after a tribute to the literary value of the Bible he suggests "whether some general system containing the outlines of Christian theology might not with advantage be considered as a necessary part of collegiate studies and whether his education should not be regarded as deficient who has no particular knowledge of the facts and doctrines described in the sacred volume."¹ In furtherance of this belief he conducted regularly a Sabbath evening exercise in Bible study in the chapel, in which all the students participated and for which he himself made especial preparation. This course was supplemented by the "theological lectures" delivered on Thursday afternoons. They were composed with great care and form the major portion of his works which were published posthumously in two octavo volumes. So earnest was he, not only in these public ministrations, but also in his daily recitations and private conversation, that it was said by one of his pupils that no one could go through Bowdoin College without receiving serious impressions.

A large portion of President Appleton's inaugural was devoted to the subject of college discipline. He held the view then prevalent that college authorities should guard with paternal care, the students should render strict obedience, and that every transgression should receive a just recompense of reward. The specified punishment must be inflicted not solely to maintain due subordination and respect for lawful authority, but as a part of a fair and honorable contract between two parties. This theory was executed with a conscientiousness and an impartiality that won respect, but that caused an amount of labor and of friction at which college Faculties of the present day would stand aghast. For playing cards, for staying away from his room at night, for failing to observe study hours, for walking or driving unnecessarily on the Sabbath and for other similar offences, definite penalties were fixed and imposed. Unfortunately, delinquencies of this sort, while they occupy page after page of the records of the executive government, were not the only ones to be punished. The habits of society at that time and the circumstance that the students, for the first twenty years of the college's existence, were mostly from the wealthier class in the community, made intemperance a formidable foe to college order and morality. The temptation to drink to excess, if opportunity be considered a part of temptation, was surely far greater than at the present day; while the personal oversight conscientiously exercised by college officers living in the buildings made every shortcoming known. The failures of men well disposed and generally correct were not overlooked. On one occasion a young man, who afterwards became a faithful and honored pastor, was publicly admonished for having been overcome with liquor. There is no reason to believe that intemperance and kindred vices were more prevalent at Bowdoin than at other colleges at this period, but it seems proper to mention the earnest and open measures taken to check them. On the failure of the public admonition, the usual course was to suspend the student. Of sixteen cases of suspension during this administration, six resulted in permanent separation from college. There were also two instances of dismissal or removal by the parent at the request of the Faculty.

It became evident in the previous administration that the endowment of the college was not sufficient to provide new buildings as they were needed, or even to maintain a suitable number of instructors for the increasing body of students. The college, therefore, was forced to appear as a suitor for legislative aid on several different occasions. In 1804 the General Court bestowed upon the two younger colleges, Williams and Bowdoin, equal rights in a "residuum of land in the town of Sullivan." This land proved to be ledge and was unsalable, until the era of speculation in 1832, when Bowdoin received two thousand dollars for its half. In March, 1806, the township now known as Etna was granted to the college. It was promptly sold, and apparently brought into the college treasury $11,311.49, the amount appropriated in September of that year for the erection of a new structure.

A college dormitory one hundred feet long, forty feet wide and four stories high, had long been an aspiration of the Boards.

They had formally voted to build it ten years before, but poverty forbade. In 1808 such an edifice was completed and occupied by the students. A few years later, having perhaps lost some of that pristine importance which rendered a special name unnecessary, it was formally designated Maine Hall, in honor of the new state. The various vicissitudes it has since experienced will be referred to in their chronological connection. It should be remembered, however, that the building was originally of greater architectural pretensions than at present, having entrances in front with an elaborate pediment. The architect was Mr. Samuel Melcher of Brunswick, who also designed the old church and Winthrop Hall. The rooms were heated by open fire-places and provided with closets for study, which could not, however, be used in winter, and with capacious "wood-holes." They were without carpet, paint, or paper, but the charge for room rent was only five dollars a year.

Encouraged by the liberality of the previous legislature, the Boards in September, 1807, petitioned for the grant of two townships of land to increase the permanent endowment of the college. The petition was granted. Unfortunately, however, the demand for wild lands had slackened. After repeated efforts to sell them unlocated, two townships in Piscataquis County, still known as the Bowdoin College Grant, were formally transferred to the college in 1813. They continued in its possession, a source of expense rather than income, for twenty years. They were then sold for $29,440. Owing to the presence of squatters the college had difficulty in disposing of the valuable lands given by Mr. Bowdoin in Bowdoin and Lisbon. Sebec, one of the townships in the original grant, brought $14,000 into the treasury; but the sales from two others, Guilford and Abbot, which were made directly to settlers, ceased during the so-called "Ohio fever," while the severe seasons of 1816-17 crippled many who had already purchased and given notes on long time. The annual income of the college repeatedly failed to meet its current expenses. Under these circumstances the President and the senior professor agreed that two hundred dollars should be deducted from their salaries each year until "better times." Some of the Trustees proposed a lottery, but fortunately for the record, if not for the wealth of the institution, this proposal did not receive the sanction of the Boards. The legislature was petitioned for pecuniary aid, not "for authorization to raise $30,000 by a lottery." Happily for all concerned, the friends of the two other colleges in the Commonwealth, Harvard and Williams, who were before the General Court on a similar errand, made a joint request. As a result an act was passed, February, 1814, "for the encouragement of literature, piety, morality, and the useful arts and sciences." This meant a bank tax of sixteen thousand dollars for ten years, from which Harvard received annually ten thousand dollars, and Bowdoin and Williams three thousand each. Each college was to use one-fourth of the grant in defraying the tuition of worthy and indigent students. The importance of this grant to Bowdoin can hardly be overestimated. It ensured the maintenance of the teaching force of five and gave promise of an addition to the number of professors whenever the endowment of wild lands became productive. It materially increased the number of students by placing a college course within the reach of many to whom the tuition charge of twenty dollars was a formidable obstacle. The portion of the grant set apart for this purpose was carefully and faithfully applied. At first a small surplus accumulated, but this disappeared in the next decade. A list of those to whom term by term an allowance was made from this source has been preserved, and it includes some of the best known and most useful workers the college has sent forth.

A minor, but hardly less satisfactory, result of the grant was the repayment of Messrs. Appleton and Abbot for the amount they had voluntarily taken from their salaries, and the assurance that similar sacrifice would be unnecessary in the future. The grant was assumed by Maine and renewed for a period of seven years. It ceased in 1831, the total amount thus received having been $51,000, of which $12,750 was paid back directly to beneficiaries of the state.

At the opening of the college a public inn was built in what is now the north-west corner of the college campus. It is probable that from the first some of the students boarded here, though a majority were accommodated in private families. In 1810 an arrangement was made with the owner, Col. T. S. Estabrook, to maintain "commons" for the tutors and students. The plan was undertaken from motives of economy and convenience. The table was presided over by the senior tutor, who said grace. The students were seated alphabetically in order of their classes, and are reported to have been orderly and respectful. The fare, plain, substantial, and inexpensive, was a subject of complaint from a few in each class who had themselves excused from the obligation to board there on the certificate of a physician that their health demanded an appetite tempted rather than satisfied. After a trial of five years the experiment was discontinued, to be renewed, however, under more favorable circumstances in 1828.

As in the previous administration the President had a large share in the work of instruction. The duties of the departments of mental and moral philosophy, and of rhetoric and oratory devolved mainly upon him. Especially after the resignation in 1816 of the chair of ancient languages by Professor Abbot, he frequently conducted the recitations in the classics. His fondness for Livy was so marked as to lead the students to maintain that, if called on to save three volumes from a burning library, the President would be found with Paley in one pocket, Livy in the other, and a big Bible in his arms. Of the character of his instruction, a pupil has given the following testimony:¹

"Instruction in Butler's Analogy, and Paley's Evidences was always his peculiar province. With how much patience, assiduity and ability were these multiplied duties performed. His decided predilection for those studies, which relate to the moral and intellectual nature of man, imparted to the recitations in these departments, as conducted by him, a high degree of interest and importance. The text books at that time in use, beside those above named, were Locke on the Human Understanding and Stewart's Elements of Intellectual Philosophy. He never permitted himself to enter the class room, without having thoroughly investigated the subject of the lesson. He usually conducted such investigations with pen in hand, and to insure precision and clearness on his part, he was accustomed to write his questions in the margin of his book. These were framed with much care and skill, so as to fix the attention more on the subject under discussion, than on the author. The students well knew, that ignorance or sloth could not escape the severe scrutiny they were obliged to undergo. Close attention and a vigorous exercise of their powers could alone stand the test, and the attentive pupil never left the recitation room without new topics for reflection, suggested both by the searching nature of the examination through which he had passed, and by the remarks of the President. . . . At different times he heard the recitations in most of the Latin and Greek authors at that period read in our colleges, and his manner of conducting these exercises was marked by the peculiarities, which have been already noted. The passage always underwent a thorough examination, and minute accuracy in the forms and syntax was required, as also in the prosody, a point then too commonly neglected. . . . The subjects assigned for forensic disputation, were usually derived from the studies of the class in intellectual, moral or political philosophy. This exercise was open to all the students of college. The decisions of the President, which were uniformly written, contained a brief summary of the most important arguments on both sides, followed by his own opinion. They were marked by that logical exactness and clear conclusive argumentation, for which he was distinguished, and were listened to with great attention. . . . The President's manner uniformly showed that he himself attached importance to the recitation. No languor, no indifference, no disposition to hurry through a task, was ever apparent in him. The natural tendency of this was to impress the student with the idea, that the exercises, at which he presided, were not to be lightly esteemed, much less to be neglected. His remarkable punctuality served to deepen this impression. It was well understood, that nothing but urgent necessity prevented him from being in his place at the appointed time. . . . It does not admit of question, that his influence had in an uncommon degree, a tendency to give his pupils habits of logical exactness in reasoning, of patient, thorough investigation, as well as to form them to a pure taste. The entire absence, moreover, of display in himself, rebuked any disposition to be superficial in them. There is indeed little risk in affirming, that a large proportion of those who enjoyed the privilege of being trained by him, are still conscious, in their mental operations, of his forming hand."

In 1812 Rev. William Jenks, D.D., pastor of a Congregational church in Bath, was chosen professor of the Oriental and the English languages. It was hoped that the finances of the college would soon allow it to claim all of the time of the new professor, who continued to hold his pastorate while giving instruction in Hebrew and taking charge of the work in English composition. This expectation was not realized, and four years later his resignation was regretfully accepted. Instruction in Hebrew, however, continued to be offered until 1866. It was an optional study, and rarely taken save by a portion of those who had the ministry in view.

Of the score of young men whom President Appleton called to assist in collegiate instruction, as tutors, not a few were attracted by his own reputation as a theologian to pursue with him their studies preparatory for the ministry. In view of this fact, it is curious to note that of the twelve who became clergymen, a majority joined the Unitarian denomination, with which the President had little sympathy. Nehemiah Cleaveland, of the Class of 1813, was, with a single exception, the only one of the twenty whose service extended beyond two years. His name deserves mention here, not alone for faithful instruction rendered at the beginning of his long career as a teacher, but also for his valuable services as historian of his Alma Mater.

The two general literary societies, the Pencilian, established in 1805, and Athenæan in 1808, began to assume in this administration that important place in college life which they afterwards held for nearly half a century and which will receive full mention in a subsequent chapter.

During President McKean's brief administration, religious life and activity existed among the teachers, not among the students. For a longer period than would be supposed, in view of the earnest efforts put forth from the first, this continued to be the case under President Appleton. The Theological Society, with a membership of seventeen, was organized in 1808, and its meetings continued to be held with greater or less regularity for forty years. Its object, however, was the friendly discussion of doctrinal and ethical questions, rather than the direct promotion of Christian living. Though its influence for practical piety was not manifest at the time of its organization, it is a significant fact that nine of these seventeen became earnest Christians in after life. The society collected a library of several hundred volumes which was incorporated with that of the college in 1850. Its discontinuance at that time seems to have been due to the increase in number and attractiveness of other student organizations, rather than in any special lack of interest in the subjects to which its discussions were devoted.¹

In 1812 two men of earnest and aggressive piety, Frederic Southgate, tutor, and James Cargill, student, were the means of establishing meetings for prayer and the promotion of personal righteousness among the students, which have been since maintained without interruption. An organization, formed three years later, and known until recently as the Praying Circle, was the agency through which these activities were conducted. Its constitution, though several times revised, always set forth the object of the association as "mutual edification of its members, the promotion of vital godliness in the college, and prayer for the universal spread of the gospel." Membership was open to those and only those who offered "charitable evidence of being real Christians" and gave "assent to the fundamental doctrines of the gospel." Its meetings have been held twice a week; one on the Sabbath, more formal in its character, and one on a week-day evening, conducted and attended as a rule by under-graduates only. Despite the presence on its rolls, from time to time, of names of unworthy members, the personal religious work it has accomplished has been very great. Its membership has varied in different years from one-tenth to one-half of the student-body.

Special religious interest marked the fall term of 1816. "The venerable Jotham Sewall preached in the college rooms with great fervor. He visited every room, talked freely, affectionately, and faithfully to us all concerning our duties to God and our eternal interests. And he earnestly besought us to be reconciled to God through Christ without delay. Especially was he devout and fervent in his prayers that God would give us his ¹In 1840, after discussing the question "till a late hour" at three different meetings, the society decided, by a vote of eleven to three, that the Bible does not teach universal salvation.

Spirit, and, the greatest of all mercies, new and contrite hearts. Soon it was apparent that those prayers were answered, that the Holy Spirit was with us of a truth. The Bible, religion, personal salvation, were the absorbing topics within the walls of Bowdoin. Those were days to be remembered."¹

The President, through whom Father Sewall had been secured to labor in this field, was indefatigable in his efforts to make permanent the results of the interest thus manifested. His feelings may be inferred from these two extracts from his private journal.

Under date of November 28, 1816, he writes: "God has been pleased, as I trust, to visit several of the students with his saving health. We do hope that at least six of the number have been transformed by the renewing of the mind. This is a great thing—a very great thing. It is what we have been long praying and longing for. A third of the students, or very nearly that portion, it is now hoped, are pious. It is but a little while since we had none of this description." A year later he writes: "As to the College, God has shown us new favors. Not only have a considerable number of serious students entered, but there have recently been, as we hope, three or four individuals converted to the Lord. This is a great thing, an unexpected mercy that God should have returned to us so soon. Those students who were thought to have experienced religion last year, have, by divine grace, done well. They appear to be good, sound, judicious, and zealous Christians. This is a glorious thing. Religion seems to have obtained strong footing in Bowdoin College."

At his death, 12 November, 1819, President Appleton was only forty-seven years of age. The pressure of his college duties, and especially his unremitting application to study, had unquestionably hastened his decease. His keen sense of personal responsibility laid on him a heavy load of anxiety. His natural tastes and his intellectual ambition led him to attempt and to accomplish, what now would be impossible, the mastery of all the subjects pursued in the college curriculum. Habits of study that for long periods only allowed four hours a day for sleep and demanded a spare diet that the need of physical exercise might be lessened, could not but injuriously affect his constitution. None the less manifest, however, were the results of his self-devotion. Under his direction the institution, with its little corps of five teachers and fifty pupils, won an enviable reputation for "good morals and sound scholarship." Among the one hundred and thirty graduates who enjoyed his instruction were two presidents of colleges, five judges of the higher state courts, one governor, and five congressmen. Of the three or four who gave themselves chiefly to literary work, at least one, Jacob Abbott, has exerted a widespread influence by his writings.

The separation of Maine from the mother state brought anxiety to many friends of the college. A few years before, the private affairs of the college treasurer had become hopelessly involved, and a temporary attachment was placed upon the property of his brother-in-law and surety, General William King, for the purpose of securing the college against possible loss. The agent in this matter was a prominent federalist and political opponent of the future governor. The latter's indignation was great and unfortunately fell, in part, on the college, which he regarded as a federalist institution. His influence was given to obtaining a charter for Waterville College, now Colby University, and to inserting in the constitution of the new state a provision that no literary institution should receive state aid unless the legislature were able "to alter, limit or restrain any of the powers vested in any such literary institution." To protect the college from this dreaded antagonism of the dominant political party, a provision was inserted in the act of separation that Maine should assume the payment of the annual grant of $3,000, until its expiration four years later, and that the president, trustees, and overseers of Bowdoin College should continue to enjoy all their rights, powers, and privileges. In the midst of the doubts and misgivings that the prospective withdrawal of state aid aroused, there is heroism as well as faith in the oft-quoted sentiment of the dying president, uttered as he looked out from his chamber window toward the college halls: "God has taken care of the college and God will take care of it."

CHAPTER V.

PRESIDENT ALLEN'S ADMINISTRATION.

Rev. William Allen—State and College—Increase of students—Benevolent society—Winthrop Hall—Maine Hall burned—Professor Newman—Professor Packard—Professor Upham—Professor Smyth—Professor Longfellow—The old faculty—The curriculum by departments—Student life—Attempted removal of the president—Second fire in Maine Hall—President Allen's resignation.

In December, 1819, Rev. William Allen was unanimously chosen president. He had marked qualifications for the position. A graduate of Harvard in 1802, he served there as regent several years, then studied theology and succeeded his father in the pastorate of the church at Pittsfield, Mass. Recently he had been at the head of the short-lived Dartmouth University. His literary reputation, early won by his biographical dictionary, his family connections, his collegiate experience, and his political views, which were in sympathy with those of the party then dominant in the state, united in making him an acceptable candidate.

In his inaugural address, President Allen set forth the advantages flowing from a cultivation of the arts and sciences, and the importance to a free commonwealth of collegiate institutions. While in striking accord with his predecessors he maintained that knowledge without virtue is valueless, he dwelt with emphasis upon the service which the college renders the state, and the essential unity of their interests. That his views on this subject were not merely theoretical was soon apparent.

The first, and, in some respects, the most important measure of his administration, was the establishment of the Medical School of Maine, of which an account will be found in the chapter relating to that institution. Closely connected, if not, indeed, necessitated by this, was the surrender to the state of the right to modify the charter of the college. By the Act of Separation, the legislature of Maine had no control over the college. By the constitution of the state, no donation could be made to a literary institution that was, so to speak, independent of the law-making power. Shall the college surrender its independence for the sake of the pittance it may receive, was the question as put by those distrustful of the future. Shall the college fail to allow the Commonwealth to render it the assistance alike needed and deserved, asked President Allen. The latter view prevailed. The Boards voted that the right to alter their powers should be vested in the legislature, and, at the same time, petitioned for a continuance of the annual grant from the bank tax, "and for such other donations as the legislature, in their wisdom, may be disposed to make." The legislature of 1820 forthwith extended the annuity of three thousand dollars for a period of seven years from February 14, 1824, the date at which it would otherwise have expired.

The following year the legislature exercised its newly acquired rights, and increased the number of trustees to twenty-five, and of overseers to sixty, giving the governor the power to appoint these new members. The appointments were men of the highest social and intellectual standing: but with few, if any exceptions, they and his excellency thought alike on political matters. The subsequent appeals to the legislature in 1825, for aid in building a chapel, and in 1831, for a continuance of the annuity, did not receive a favorable response.

The commencement of 1821, to which the governor came with his staff and an escort of cavalry, and which was largely attended by prominent and influential men from all parts of the state, revived memories of the famous first commencement. Popular favor seemed lavished on the college. It was also marked by the entrance of the largest class the college had yet known, and one destined to be its most famous. The noticeable increase in the number of students at this period resulted from several causes, among which the growing reputation of the college and its improved facilities for instruction were prominent. The extension of the field for professional, as distinct from commercial employment, and the higher estimate placed upon education throughout the new state, also had their influence. Though the tuition had been raised to twenty-four dollars, the room rent to ten, and Sallust, Ancient and Modern Geography, and Walsh's Arithmetic added to the entrance requirements, the proportion of students dependent upon their own exertions, or from families of limited means, became materially greater than ever before. For the assistance of this class the Benevolent Society was organized in the previous administration, and incorporated in 1826. This organization, by annual assessments on its members, and by the solicitation of gifts from the public, raised a considerable sum of money which it loaned, without interest, to needy students in small amounts. It also provided books and furniture, as far as its means would allow, with only a nominal charge for their use. Its prosperity and efficiency, however, seemed to have languished not long after it became legally a body corporate, and no record is preserved of its activity subsequent to 1830.

The increase in students made it necessary to provide additional accommodations. In September, 1821, the Boards authorized the erection of a new hall at a cost of ten thousand dollars. This building was erected the following year, and, after being long known as New College and as North College, received, in 1848, its present designation of Winthrop Hall in honor of Governor John Winthrop of the Massachusetts Bay Colony.

Work had not begun on this edifice when, March 4, 1822, Maine Hall caught fire and the entire interior was consumed. The fire is supposed to have started in the garret and, when discovered at three o'clock in the afternoon, was beyond control. The loss of private property was considerable, being estimated at the time at $1,500. The loss to the college was far more serious, as there was no insurance. This calamity, however, became a source of benefit through the liberality of the contributions to repair the loss. These were systematically sought throughout Maine and Massachusetts by friends and alumni, and prominent men in Washington were also solicited. Among the contributors were President Monroe, John Quincy Adams, and John C. Calhoun. As a result, nearly ten thousand dollars was raised, while the restoration of the building, since the walls proved to be practically uninjured, cost but sixty-five hundred dollars.

Of greater importance than new buildings were the accessions to the Faculty that signalized President Allen's administration. The first was Samuel Phillips Newman, who had graduated with honor at Harvard in 1816 and had since been engaged in teaching and in theological studies under President Appleton. He served as tutor for two years prior to his inauguration in 1820 as professor of the ancient languages. It was, however, in the professorship of rhetoric and oratory, established in 1824, and to which he was transferred, that his most valued services were rendered. His treatise on rhetoric, published soon after, was an admirable text-book, as shown by the number of schools and colleges in which it was adopted and the sixty editions through which it passed. His department was made to include the rising science of political economy, and the substance of his lectures on that subject was issued in 1835 as an elementary treatise. As a man even more than as a teacher, was his influence felt. Possessed of much business ability, faithful, prompt, and firm in the discharge of duty, his services, especially during the two years of President Allen's absence, when he was acting president, were invaluable to the institution. Of him a pupil¹ writes: "His genial, unaffected manners, his genuine sincerity, and faithful discharge of duty secured the respect, confidence, and affection of the students, while his catholic sentiments and Christian charity endeared him alike to orthodox and heterodox." His regretted resignation in 1839 was followed hardly two years later by his death at the age of forty-five.

Alpheus Spring Packard, a graduate of 1816, who had given the three intervening years to teaching, was appointed tutor in 1819, and professor of ancient languages and classical literature in 1824. For forty-one years Professor Packard conducted the work in Latin and Greek, a part of the time without the assistance of a tutor, while for three of these years, 1842-5, he also had oversight of the department of rhetoric and oratory. In his inaugural address on the method in which the classics should be taught, he said: "Like faithful guides we are to show the pupil the most direct path to knowledge and become companions of his way, pointing out to him as he advances, whatever may animate and allure, and leading him to the most favorable points, whence he may view all that is grand and beautiful." This simple yet comprehensive ideal he faithfully strove to carry out. His habit was not to dwell upon minute philological and grammatical details, but to unfold and illustrate the thought of the author. His recitations were enriched by occasional lectures carefully prepared to stimulate the student's appreciation of the literary style of the author read and the historical relations of the text. He felt keenly the importance of a correct yet free translation of the original, paragraph by paragraph, a method to which William Pitt, as he was wont to remind his pupils, owed much of his remarkable fluency and facility in debate. This characteristic of his teaching, the more noticeable by reason of its departure from the traditional method,¹ sometimes incited his students to renderings more idiomatic than he desired, as, for instance, when John P. Hale translated dimidium facti, qui caput, habet—"well lathered is half shaved." His genuine interest in educational matters led to several essays and addresses which were published in the North American Review and in the Collections of the American Institute of Instruction, and he edited for the Harpers in 1839 a school edition of Xenophon's Memorabilia of Socrates, which passed through three editions.

In February, 1825, Thomas Cogswell Upham was formally inaugurated Professor of Metaphysics and Moral Philosophy and Lecturer on Biblical Literature. Professor Upham was graduated at Dartmouth in 1818, pursued a theological course at Andover, and, at its close, was chosen Professor Stuart's assistant in Hebrew. The reputation he had won as a scholar, in part by his translation and abridgment of Jahn's Archæology, led to his being called from a brief pastorate in Rochester, N. H., to the newly established professorship at Bowdoin. He entered upon his field of labor at an important period. Locke and Reid had, hitherto, reigned supreme, but now the philosophical discourses of Coleridge were being read, Cousin's teachings in France were awakening popular interest and, above all, the influence of Kant was becoming more and more widely felt in America. He was expected to oppose the tide of German metaphysics, which his denomination regarded as likely to unsettle and lead astray. The young professor accepted in the main the Scottish philosophy. The views of this school he incorporated in 1827 in a volume styled "A Compilation of Intellectual Philosophy." This, in 1831, he elaborated into a more original and systematic work in two volumes. It met with a favorable reception in both this country and England. The late Prof. Henry B. Smith wrote in 1837:¹ "We know of no work on mental philosophy which has so much completeness and inclusiveness. It is eminently practical without being commonplace, and is cast in a form well fitted for purposes of instruction. To deeper and more fundamental investigations it is a safe and sufficient introduction, and by its impartiality will guard against that exclusiveness of spirit which may make a partisan, but never made a philosopher." The work passed through several editions, and was widely used as a college text-book. One of his pupils, Rev. Dr. Cyrus Hamlin, translated it into Armenian and employed it at Robert College, Constantinople. Three years later, he published his "Treatise on the Will," which must be regarded as his most original work, and which formed the third volume of subsequent editions of the Mental Philosophy.

Though an able and faithful instructor, Professor Upham undoubtedly contributed more to the reputation and influence of the college by his writings than by his recitations. In addition to the philosophical works just mentioned, his religious and miscellaneous contributions to literature had a wide circulation. On the subject of the higher Christian life, there appeared in 1844, "Principles of the Interior Life," and this was followed in subsequent years by "Religious Maxims," "The Life of Faith," "Treatise on Divine Union," "Life and Religious Opinions of Madame Guyon." An early and earnest advocate of peace, his essay on the congress of nations and his manual of peace were stereotyped and circulated by the American Peace Society. In 1852 he visited Europe and the Holy Land, and the resulting series of letters, reprinted in book form for a circle of friends, met with such favor that the work passed through two editions. A volume of minor poems, collected under the title, "American Cottage Life," was a favorite gift book a generation ago, and several of the pieces it contained are never omitted from any extended religious anthology. Of a remarkably retiring disposition, he at the same time possessed a knowledge of human nature and a persistency that enabled him to secure for the college, by personal solicitation, over seventy thousand dollars, largely from a denomination that had distrusted its management. Failing health led him to retire from the duties of his professorship in 1867. His active mind, however, continued its work, his last book, "Absolute Religion," appearing after his death. This occurred in New York City, 2 April, 1872.

After Professor Cleaveland began to devote himself to the natural sciences, most of the instruction in mathematics fell to the tutors. It consisted mainly in the pupils studying the prescribed lesson in Webber's Mathematics and subsequently repeating it. What is now called original work was quite unknown. Occasionally, however, a practical exercise in surveying was given. In geometry each student had a blank book in which he drew the figures and which he used in demonstrating. In algebra problems were worked out on a slate and the result explained at the teacher's side. In a crowded recitation room it sometimes happened that correct answers followed incorrect processes. "How did you get that result?" a tutor once asked a Bowdoin Sophomore, who afterwards became president of the United States. "From Stowe's slate," was the frank reply.

In 1824 Tutor William Smyth, a graduate of two years standing and fresh from a year of theological study at Andover, introduced with his Sophomores in algebra the use of the blackboard. This novel experiment, as it then seemed, was a great success. The enthusiasm that the young teacher awakened is indicated by the fact that a class which had completed the subject, petitioned for a review of it under the new method. The following year Mr. Smyth, abandoning his first love, Greek, in which he had won some distinction, accepted the professorship of mathematics, and began his long occupancy of that chair, terminated only by his death in 1868. With characteristic zeal and earnestness he gave himself to an extended study of the French system of mathematics. His active mind and unusual power of concentration enabled him to read Laplace's Mécanique Céleste, at the close of days of vexatious drudgery. His manuscripts with their carefully elaborated formulæ show that he not only read but mastered.

Under circumstances that would have deterred one of less indomitable will, he prepared his well-known series of mathematical text-books. The first was a small work on plane trigonometry, issued for the use of his own classes in 1825. His algebra appeared in 1830, received warm commendation from Dr. Bowditch, and was adopted as a text-book at Harvard and at other institutions. After passing through several editions it took the form of two separate books, the Elementary Algebra and the College Text-book of Algebra. In 1834 elementary algebra was made one of the requirements for admission. Two years later he published an enlarged edition of the trigonometry with the applications of the science to surveying and navigation. His treatise on analytic geometry was issued in the same year, and in 1854 his Elements of the Differential and Integral Calculus. The last mentioned work evinced no little originality. It received emphatic approval in high quarters, notably from the late Professor Baché. In addition to his mathematical instruction Professor Smyth gave lectures on natural philosophy, and towards the close of his life on astronomy. With all his college work he found time to labor earnestly for the general interest of the community and in social reforms. The public schools of the town were graded and suitable buildings erected largely through his exertions; the church and the parish found him a never-tiring worker. He early joined the anti-slavery movement, met hardship and even outrage in the advocacy of his views, and his house was a well-known station on the under-ground railway.

The professorship of modern languages was the last of the four new chairs established under President Allen. Instruction in French had been given as early as 1820 by a native who was not awarded a place upon the faculty, though on one occasion, at least, the college treasurer assumed the payment of his fees.

In September, 1825, the Boards voted "that a professorship be established for the instruction of the Junior and Senior classes in the modern languages of Europe, particularly in French and Spanish, and that until a professor be elected, the executive government make the best provision in their power for such instruction at an expense not exceeding $500." This temporary provision was made by engaging Joseph Hale Abbot, of the class of 1822, who had pursued post-graduate studies at Cambridge, and who was subsequently a successful teacher in Boston. A professor, it is said, was informally selected at the same time in the person of a talented young man of the graduating class, whose well-known literary ability had recently, according to tradition, forced itself upon the attention of a prominent trustee by the fine rendering of an ode of Horace. It was soon after arranged that Henry W. Longfellow, after three or four years of study abroad (he was then a youth of nineteen), should fill the chair now known as the Longfellow Professorship. Upon this he entered in 1829. One who enjoyed his instruction writes as follows: ¹

"He had secured a large place for his department in the curriculum and he awakened great enthusiasm among the students. In studying French we used a grammar which he had himself prepared. In studying Italian we used a grammar in the French language also prepared by the professor. His painstaking in preparing these grammars was one of many indications of his enthusiasm in his teaching. But he did not confine himself to linguistic teaching. He aimed to open to us the literature of these languages, especially the French, and to arouse us to interest in it. In addition to the recitations already mentioned he gave a course of lectures on French literature. They were given in the chapel to the students of all the classes who chose to attend. I remember these lectures as highly elaborated and in their style highly finished and polished. Under his teaching we were able to gain a knowledge of these languages which it was easy to retain and complete after graduation so as to use them through life in the study of their respective literatures. But he did not attempt to teach us to converse in them. His literary attainments, spirit, and enthusiasm did not fail to exert an inspiring and refining influence on those thus associated with him through four years."

Of Mr. Longfellow's own view of his work, the following extracts from his inaugural address, delivered 17 August, 1830, give an interesting glimpse :

“ When a man's duty and his inclination go hand in hand surely he has no small reason to rejoice, no feeble stimulus to act. The truth of this I feel. I regard the profession of a teacher in a far more noble and elevated point of view than many do. I can not help believing that he who bends in a right direction the pliant disposition of the young and trains up the ductile mind to a vigorous and healthy growth, does something for the welfare of his country and something for the great interests of humanity. . . . I cannot regard the study of a language as the pastime of a listless hour. To trace the progress of the human mind through the progressive development of language, to learn how other nations thought and felt and spoke, to enrich the understanding by opening upon it new sources of knowledge and by speaking many tongues to become a citizen of the world, these are objects worthy the exertion their attainment demands at our hands. The mere acquisition of a language then is not the ultimate object, it is a means to be employed in the acquisition of something which lies beyond. I should therefore deem my duty but half performed were I to limit my exertions to the narrow bounds of grammatical rules, nay, that I had done little for the intellectual culture of a pupil, when I had merely put an instrument into his hands without explaining to him its most important uses. It is little to point one to the portals of the magic gardens and enchanted halls of learning and to teach him certain cabalistic words at whose utterance the golden hinges of its gates shall turn:—he must be led through the glittering halls and fragrant bowers and shown where the richest treasures lie and where the clearest fountains spring. And it will be my aim not only to teach the turns and idioms of a language, but according to my ability and as soon as time and circumstances shall permit, to direct the student into the literature of those nations whose languages he is studying.”

It is believed that under Professor Longfellow, Bowdoin was the first New England college to give that prominence to modern languages as a part of the required course which has since become so general. The appointment of Professor Ticknor at Harvard antedates his by a dozen years, but the duties assigned to the former in the work of instruction were far less. At Yale, during this period, teachers in French and Spanish were recommended by the faculty, but the students paid extra fees for such instruction, and the study of modern languages was not required for a degree. After his resignation in 1836 to accept a corresponding position at Harvard, the character and traditions of the professorship were worthily maintained for nearly twenty years by Daniel Raynes Goodwin, afterwards provost of the University of Pennsylvania, who, like Mr. Longfellow, had prepared himself for his duties by residence and study abroad.

The academic faculty which President Allen gathered around him continued, with the exceptions already noted, to be the teaching force for two-score years. The services of Cleaveland, Newman, Upham, Packard, and Smyth, continuing on an average upwards of forty-five years, gave a peculiar individuality to the institution for the first half of its existence. They were men of marked and varying personality. Their characters have been thus portrayed by one who knew them well, both as pupil and as colleague :¹

“There was the impassive, inflexible Allen, precise, stately, stiff; but just and kind and faithful; antiqua homo virtute et fide: more learned than apt to teach; a good ruler for all but the unruly. There is a maxim of college government emanating from the school of the celebrated and excellent Dr. Nott, which reads something like this: ‘Be sure you make friends of the scoundrels, you need have no fear from the good men’; or, in its earlier and naïve pagan version, ‘Keep on good terms with the Devil, and God will do you no harm.’ President Allen never adopted the detestable maxim. He never courted popularity, and so, perhaps, he never deserved it. With a warm and generous heart beating unseen and unsuspected beneath the cold exterior, living in all good conscience before God every day, he met abuse and obloquy with the invincible bravery of Christian meekness. Late he has gone to his rest.

“There, too, was the gentle Newman, the faithful friend, the classical scholar, the skillful and patient teacher, the accomplished Christian gentleman;—beautiful, delicate, pure as the opening flower of spring, he faded early from our sight; but he left the fragrance of a good man’s name behind.

¹Rev. Dr. Daniel R. Goodwin, in his Alumni Address of July 8, 1873. The graceful tribute to Professor Packard, who was present, is omitted, as it does not attempt to characterize the man.

“There was the magnificent and massive Cleaveland, clarum et venerabile nomen,—totus, teres atque rotundus,—with stuff enough in him to make a dozen men; exuberant in intellectual powers, in labor indefatigable, of eagle vision, masterly in construction, wise in selection, lucid in exposition, a true lover of science, but an inveterate hater of theory; as a lecturer unequalled, as a teacher unsurpassed; the model professor, joining gravity and playfulness in one, making knowledge attractive and study a delight; in government claiming severity as his own exclusive privilege, yet always shrinking from its actual exercise; forgetting nothing, remembering everybody; among the fathers and founders of the college, yet the genial brother of all her sons. He fell bravely in the harness; and never did college suffer a sorer bereavement.

“There was the indomitable and uncompromising Smyth: justus, propositi tenax, stern in principle, rough in exterior, yet of finest sensibilities, a great heart in courage and in kindness, a Bayard in chivalrous sentiments, of more than feminine tenderness and delicacy, unselfish, uncalculating, often the best friend of those who took him for their enemy. To be first a man and then a gentleman, esse quam videri, was the motto of his life. He was a conscious enemy to no one. His was a fierce and fiery nature, but its intensest heats had their focus in the intellect and the conscience, in the clear apprehension and deep sense of right, and not in any violence of passion. His greatest fault was that, born an enthusiast, he was made a professor of mathematics. He loved his family with a peculiar strength of affection,—so he loved his friends, so he loved his church, so he loved his country, and so he loved the college. Whatever he felt, he felt through and through; whatever he did, he did with all his might. The college had no more devoted and zealous servant or benefactor than Professor Smyth. For the college he lived and for the college he died.

“There, too, was the sensitive and saintly Upham, who has but just passed away from his earthly labors;—half hermit, half man of the world; a most extraordinary combination of weakness and strength, of simplicity and astuteness, of bashful modesty and unflinching boldness, shrinking as the mimosa, not only from human touch but from the very gaze of human eyes, yet ready to march fearlessly to the cannon’s mouth—in the dark; a poet, a philosopher, a philanthropist, a mystic, the very apostle of universal love; prolific in plans, exhaustless in expedients, in effort unwearied, as versatile and many-sided as Ulysses,—but to the right and the good as steady at heart as the needle to the pole; often, perhaps habitually, driven by sheer modesty out of the straightforward high road into by-paths and circuitous ways. Of large and varied learning, and of the broadest human sympathies, genial, and generous to a fault, he sought to find what was good in everybody,—even in the oddest and most anomalous specimens of human kind. He did as much as any man to give a high reputation to Bowdoin College. He knew no vacation when any work was to be done in her behalf, and that he might increase her endowment, he impoverished himself.”

To give at the same time a definite and an accurate account of the work these men did and of the curriculum as it existed under President Allen, the following tabular statement has been prepared from the annual reports to the visiting committee for the year 1833. It should be noted that Professor Newman had charge of the chapel services in the absence of the President, and that Professor Longfellow was college librarian, a position requiring his attendance at the library from twelve to one each day. Occasional lectures not mentioned in their reports were given by him and by Professor Packard, for which probably some regular recitation was omitted. The average length of the three terms was a little more than twelve weeks.

DEPARTMENT OF NATURAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

FIRST TERM.	Seniors, 74 recitations in Astronomy and Spherical Trigonometry, including Nautical Astronomy, with exercises on globes, tellurion and other apparatus.
SECOND TERM.	Seniors, 74 recitations in Chemistry. Medical Class, Seniors, Juniors, 62 lectures on Chemistry.
THIRD TERM.	Seniors, 49 recitations in Natural History. Seniors, 41 lectures on Mineralogy and Geology. Seniors, 33 lectures on Natural Philosophy.

Professor Cleaveland's famous lectures on chemistry must not be mentioned without describing them. “After an early breakfast, it was his invariable custom, continued to the last years of his life, to go to his laboratory, and employ the whole intervening time in preparing for the lecture of the day, laying out his topics, performing beforehand every experiment, and practicing every manipulation. These preparations were interrupted only by the frugal repast sent to him from his house in a small basket when the dinner hour had arrived. In these preparations he always had one or more assistants. When at length the hour of the lecture had arrived, and the eager and punctual audience had assembled, and, after seven minutes by the watch, the door was closed, and silence prevailed, and the Professor stood forth amidst his batteries and retorts, master of his subject and of the mighty agents he had to deal with, he was then indeed in his element and in his glory. Though clad in garments almost rustic, he had a dignity of appearance and an air of command, by which the eye of every student was kept fixed, and all listlessness and inattention were banished. His stern and venerable features were lit up with a glow of genuine enthusiasm. Forgetful of himself he became wholly absorbed in his subject. He professed no great discoveries, he propounded no new theories, he made no pedantic display of learning; but with the modesty of true wisdom aimed only to exhibit those certain facts and obvious inductions, which constitute the elements of his science. Having clearly conceived of these, and having them well arranged in his own mind, he produced them in a clear and orderly manner. There was no confusion in his thoughts, and none in his discourse. By his clear and simple style and its easy and uninterrupted flow, by his lucid order, by the earnestness of his manner, by the interest with which he seemed to regard the smallest and most common things pertaining to his theme, by his happy illustrations and never-failing experiments, and by his occasional sallies of wit and good humor, he carried along the delighted attention of his hearers without weariness to the end of the hour, making plain to them what had been obscure, investing even trivial things, by a salutary illusion, with an air of importance, and in short accomplishing in a manner which has never been surpassed, the great object of conveying to the mind of the learner definite notions and useful knowledge on the subject under consideration."¹

DEPARTMENT OF RHETORIC, ORATORY AND POLITICAL ECONOMY.

FIRST TERM.	Seniors, 120 themes, of which 80 are corrected and returned.
	Juniors, 300 themes, of which 250 are corrected and returned.
	Sophomores, 330 translations, which are corrected and returned.

- SECOND TERM. Seniors, 74 recitations in Political Economy.
 Seniors, 120 themes, of which 80 are corrected and returned.
 Juniors, 300 themes, of which 250 are corrected and returned.
 Sophomores, 330 translations, which are corrected and returned.
- THIRD TERM. Juniors, 300 themes, of which 250 are corrected and returned.
 Sophomores, 330 translations, which are corrected and returned.
 Sophomores, 36 recitations in Rhetoric.
 Freshmen, 72 exercises in Elocution.

Public declamations were conducted every Wednesday afternoon in the first and third terms, and private declamations on Fridays in the same terms.

DEPARTMENT OF MENTAL AND MORAL PHILOSOPHY.

- FIRST TERM. Seniors, 62 recitations in Stewart's Philosophy.
 Seniors, 48 recitations in Vattel's Law of Nations.
 Freshmen, 72 recitations in Latin.
- SECOND TERM. Seniors, 48 recitations in Hebrew.
 Juniors, 62 recitations in Upham's Mental Philosophy.
 Freshmen, 72 recitations in Livy and Roman Antiquities.
- THIRD TERM. Seniors, 20 recitations in Butler's Analogy.
 Seniors, 40 recitations in Hebrew.
 Juniors, 30 recitations in Upham's Mental Philosophy.
 Juniors, 30 recitations in Rawle's Constitution of United States.
 Freshmen, 36 recitations in Latin.
 Freshmen, 30 recitations in Hedge's Logic.

Forensics by the Seniors during the first two terms and by the Juniors during the third term were under the charge of Professor Upham.

DEPARTMENT OF ANCIENT LANGUAGES.

- FIRST TERM. Juniors, 48 recitations in Juvenal.
 Juniors, 60 recitations in Homer.
 Sophomores, 72 recitations in Græca Majora and Excerpta Latina.
 Freshmen, 72 recitations in Greek Historians.

- SECOND TERM. Seniors, 48 recitations in Virgil.
 Juniors, 60 recitations in Homer.
 Sophomores, 72 recitations in Græca Majora and Horace.
 Freshmen, 72 recitations in Græca Majora.
- THIRD TERM. Juniors, 24 recitations in Greek.
 Sophomores, 36 recitations in Græca Majora and Horace.
 Freshmen, 72 recitations in Greek Orators.
 Optional class, 18 recitations in Latin.

As Professor Packard frequently heard his classes in two divisions, it was practically impossible for him to conduct the work of the Freshmen in Latin, which was for many years assumed by Professor Upham.

DEPARTMENT OF MATHEMATICS.

- FIRST TERM. Juniors, 72 recitations in Mechanics.
 Sophomores, 72 recitations in Plane Trigonometry.
 Freshmen, 60 recitations in Algebra.
- SECOND TERM. Juniors, 72 recitations in Electricity, Magnetism, and Optics.
 Sophomores, 72 recitations in Surveying and Navigation.
 Freshmen, 60 recitations in Algebra.
- THIRD TERM. Juniors, 72 recitations in Calculus.
 Sophomores, 72 recitations in Projections and Leveling.
 Freshmen, 60 recitations in Geometry.

In this department also the Sophomores and Freshmen recited for a portion of the year in two divisions each, so that Professor Smyth had on the whole an average of four recitations a day during the academic year.

DEPARTMENT OF MODERN LANGUAGES.

- FIRST TERM. Juniors, 66 recitations in Spanish.
 Sophomores, 60 recitations in French.
- SECOND TERM. Seniors, 48 recitations in German.
 Seniors, 48 recitations in Italian.
 Juniors, 66 recitations in Spanish.
 Sophomores, 60 recitations in French.
- THIRD TERM. Seniors, 32 recitations in German.
 Seniors, 32 recitations in Italian.
 Juniors, 66 recitations in Spanish.
 Sophomores, 60 recitations in French.

According to the printed regulations the life of a student during this administration was marked by a healthful regularity in the hours of work and play. He rose with the ringing of the chapel bell at six. Immediately after morning prayers, held in a building that was deemed by the Faculty too cold during the winter term for any exercise lasting more than fifteen minutes, he attended the first recitation of the day. At its close came breakfast in Commons Hall.¹ As the association which conducted Commons was under student management and only charged a shilling a day for board, it is fair to assume that the average collegian did not tarry long, and consequently had an hour and a half for play before the nine o'clock bell called him to his room for study. At eleven came the midday recitation. After that he had the opportunity of consulting the college library, open for an hour. Since no under-graduate could borrow books oftener than once in three weeks, and Freshmen were limited to one book at a time, this opportunity did not keep many from dinner, which was served at about the same time. Study hours began again at two o'clock and continued till the afternoon recitation, which preceded evening prayers by an hour. These two daily religious exercises were conducted by the President. After prayers the third period for exercise and relaxation extended to eight o'clock. It is probable, however, that some tolerably good as well as the bad boys did "without permission of the executive Government go a shooting or fishing," while many of the hours so carefully allotted to study and to sleep were spent in concocting and executing various "scrapes" which the published memoirs of graduates and college tradition have made sufficiently familiar.²

President Allen's administration, which opened with a distinct advance in the character of the institution and the number of its pupils, was clouded towards the end of its first decade by his personal unpopularity with a majority of the Boards, and by the unjust measures taken to secure his removal. His stately and reserved bearing concealed a warm and generous heart, yet few realized this save his intimate friends. His manners were those of his own college days, when President Willard had but to show himself in the college yard, and students and tutors alike kept their heads uncovered till he was out of sight. With this outward coldness of demeanor was combined a firm and inflexible will which followed what seemed the right course, with no attempt to avoid or lessen the personal opposition his decisions would arouse. These circumstances, coupled with denominational jealousies, led to a singular piece of special legislation. In March, 1831, a law was enacted, providing "that no person now holding the office of president in any college in this state shall hold said office beyond the day of the next Commencement unless he shall be re-elected. No person shall be elected or re-elected to the office of president unless he shall receive in each board two-thirds of all the votes given on the question of his election." It was not concealed by the advocates of this measure that their sole desire was to remove Dr. Allen from the position which he had been chosen to hold "during good behavior." At the next meeting of the Trustees, of seventeen votes cast for president, Dr. Allen had seven. It was manifestly impossible under the law to choose his successor, and overtures were made to him that he should be re-elected and then resign. He refused to consider this proposition, and prepared to bring the legality of the act of the legislature before the courts. He removed his family to Newburyport, Mass., and as a resident of another state began an action in the U. S. Circuit Court against the college treasurer for his salary and fees. The case was argued before Judge Story in May, 1833, Hon. Simon Greenleaf appearing for the plaintiff, and Hon. Stephen Longfellow for the college treasurer. The decision of Judge Story not only re-instated Dr. Allen in his office, but also restored the institution to the independent position secured by the article in the Act of Separation, under which Maine became a new state. For it held that the attempted surrender of rights therein reserved had not been carried out, and incidentally showed that the act of 1821, increasing the membership of the Boards, and that of 1826, making the governor of the state an ex officio Trustee, were unconstitutional. The decision was largely influenced by the famous Dartmouth College case of 1819, and it is a noteworthy coincidence that the same principle of law that removed President Allen from the short-lived Dartmouth University should have restored him, a few years later, to the same position at Bowdoin.

As to its effect upon their membership, the Boards viewed the decision in different lights. The Overseers resolved that an appointment under the Act of 1821 gave no right to a seat in their body, that certain subsequent elections were invalid, that only forty persons were now lawfully members, and that there were five vacancies. The Trustees, on the other hand, disregarded this portion of the decision as extra-judicial, and although it was tacitly understood that no new elections should be made, it was twelve years before their number was reduced, by death and resignation, to the thirteen provided for in the charter, and over forty years before the last trustee appointed by Governor King, ceased to meet with the Board.

Few American colleges have suffered less by fire during a hundred years than has Bowdoin. This circumstance will perhaps warrant the insertion of a full account of the second and last serious conflagration it has met with, taken from the private letter of a young Sophomore :

FEBRUARY 17th, 1836.

DEAR FATHER :

I suppose that you will have heard of the fire here before this reaches you. It began about two o'clock this morning in the north-east corner of Maine Hall, either in the cellar or on the lower floor; the room has lately had a new fire-place, and it is supposed to have originated in some defect in this. It was occupied by Richardson a freshman; as his bed was out of order in some way, he came to McKeen Hall¹ and slept with Scamman; if he had not he would undoubtedly been smothered by the dense smoke. One of the students in the fourth story was the first to smell the smoke, he jumped up and without stopping to attempt to save anything ran down stairs breaking open all the students' doors as he passed them. All the students in that end lost everything but the clothes they wore, most of them leaving their outside garments and watches even. Dr. Adams, the tutor, roomed in that end, and believing when he awaked that the staircase was in flames, he jumped out of the window and broke his leg just above the ankle; he was found lying on the ground by some of the students who carried him into New College. Silsbee, one of the two who walked to Portland and back the same day, knew that there was a letter for his chum in the fourth story of that entry containing a hundred dollars. The staircase was by this time entirely destroyed, but the room happened to be a middle one, and he went into the one next to it in the other end, climbed around the double wall separating the two ends, passing from one window to the other, got the letter and returned in safety. This was very difficult and dangerous on account of the thickness of the college walls and what no other fellow could have done.

The flames were communicated by the roof to the other half of the building, and beginning at the top, of course consumed it very slowly; everything was saved from this end even the doors and windows. The Peucinian library was saved with very little injury, losing only those books which were in the students' rooms in the north-western end. The Athenæan library containing over three thousand volumes, many very valuable, was entirely destroyed with the exception of such as are out.

One or two of the students who slept at home came in the morning to attend prayers and were quite "struck aback" to see nothing of the great building but the blackened, windowless, doorless, roofless walls; they had heard the cry, but thought it was nothing but the yaggers' houses. There will be no recitations to-day as the recitation rooms are all burned, and the government are all busy finding quarters for the students.

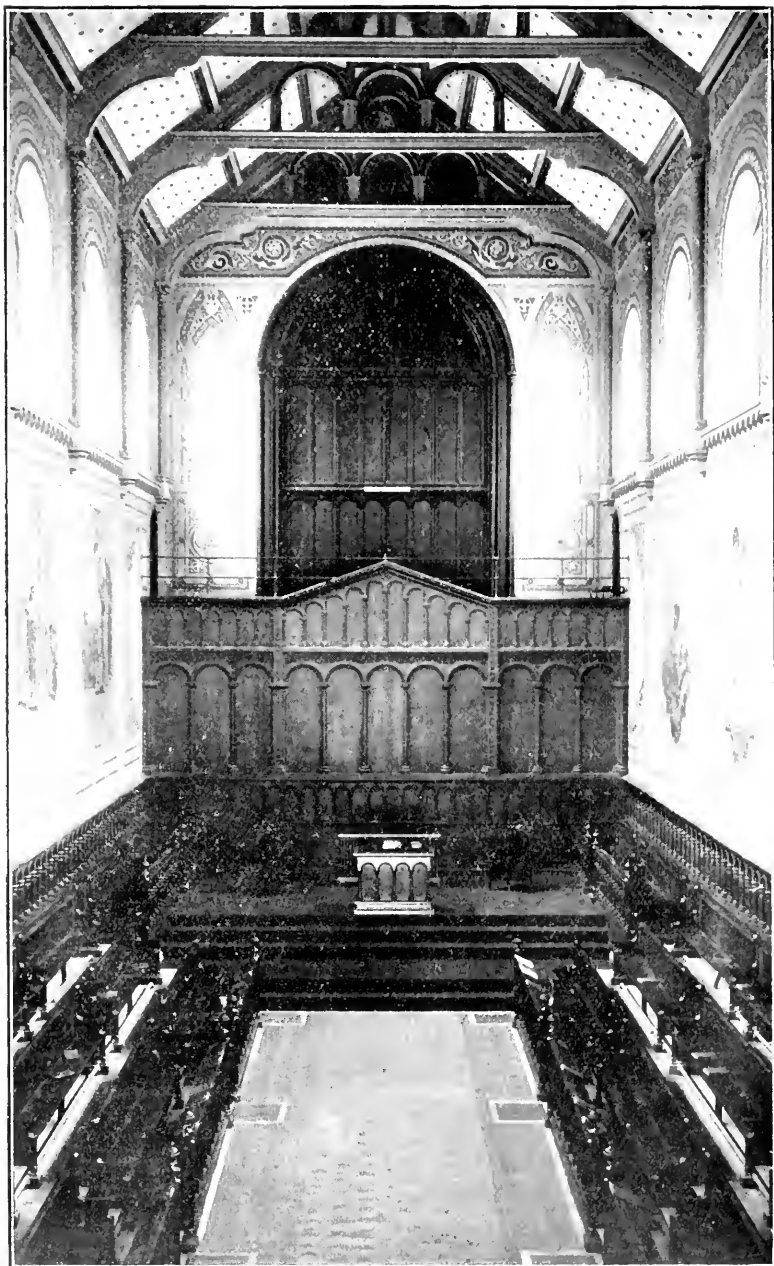

Give my love to mother and believe me your affectionate son

EDWARD.

President Allen resumed his college duties in 1833 with much of the favor that accompanies a firm and successful defense of one's rights. The prejudice against him, however, on the part of influential members of the Boards continued as strong as ever. Unfortunately, within a few years, his impopularity with the students increased to an extent that rendered his position unpleasant. In deference to the opinion of friends, who believed this twofold antagonism prejudicial to the interests of the college, he tendered his resignation in 1838, to take effect the following year. He retired to a life of literary activity at Northampton, Mass., and there, also, his closing years were spent in well-earned repose. His death occurred 16 July, 1868, in his eighty-fifth year.

The clouds that obscured its close have passed away, and it is now possible to see clearly the advance made during this administration. While the ridiculous system still prevailed at some New England colleges of intrusting the entire work of a class to one tutor for one term, to another for the second, and so on, President Allen arranged for instruction by departments and placed each in the hands of an experienced teacher. To the popular demand for a "practical" education, a demand then at one of its periodic seasons of prominence, he made the best possible reply in the establishment of the Medical School and in the addition of modern languages to the curriculum. During the preceding five years, the average number of academic students was fifty; during his administration it was one hundred and twenty-five. The subsequent career of many in those nineteen classes must have been a source of pride to the president who signed their diplomas: for they gave to literature, Hawthorne and Longfellow; to law, John Appleton and Thomas Drummond; to theology, Samuel Harris and Henry B. Smith; to medicine, Fordyce Barker; to political life, Franklin Pierce, William Pitt Fessenden, John P. Hale, Seargent S. Prentiss, and John A. Andrew.

THE CHAPEL.

CHAPTER VI.

PRESIDENT WOODS'S ADMINISTRATION.

College finances—President Woods—His views on College discipline—Residence abroad—The chapel—Tutors—Impairment of the endowment—Denominational position of the College—Collins Professorship—Representation of different denominations in the Board of Trustees—Semi-centennial—Law school—Improvement of the grounds—The curriculum—Alumni bequests—Resignation of President Woods.

The financial depression that followed the panic of 1837 seriously affected the income of the college. Its invested funds then amounted to one hundred thousand dollars, of which eight-tenths were in bank stocks. The dividends from these failed to such an extent that, while the total expenditures were under ten thousand dollars, there was an annual deficit of two thousand for several years. The darkness of the financial outlook was not brightened by the disagreement of the Boards as to the new president. The Trustees chose, in 1838, Professor Chauncey A. Goodrich, of Yale, but the selection was not satisfactory to the Overseers. The following year they also vetoed the election of William G. Goddard, then professor of rhetoric in Brown University. The third selection of the Trustees, that of Leonard Woods, Jr., professor of biblical literature in Bangor Theological Seminary, was promptly ratified by the lower Board. As the son of a famous and influential New England theologian: as a college student who had graduated at nineteen with the maximum rank in every study: as a successful and popular teacher at Andover and at Bangor: as the translator and editor of Knapp's Theology, widely used as a text-book, and reprinted in England: as the editor of a periodical noted alike for its ability and its independence: as a preacher, the charm of whose sermons elicited from cultured listeners praise that seems almost extravagant: as a conversationalist of rare natural powers, increased by a wide range of reading: this young man of thirty-one had led his acquaintances to anticipate a brilliant career for him and for the college under his direction. He came to the work with a willing spirit, asking that a larger amount of teaching than had been usual should be assigned him, and with an ideal of what a college president should be, as high as it was diverse from that of several of those who voted for him.

Reference can be made only to those traits of his attractive and many-sided character that appeared prominently in his administration. There had naturally been some disorder in the closing months of Dr. Allen's presidency. Indeed, there was a suspicion that the burning of the President's house, after his removal from Brunswick, might be laid to the charge of some reckless undergraduate. The new president called to his study one after another of those who were thought to have been leaders in the disturbances. They went with surprise, for they believed "all the old scores wiped off, and there had been no time to run up new ones. There was nothing said about old scores or new ones. The President met them with that kind and graceful courtesy that was peculiar to him. He talked to them of the opportunities of college life, and made them feel, as though it had been their thought rather than his, the obligation that such opportunities impose. This simple conversation, held with one as he sat with him in his study, with another as he walked with him among the pines, was sufficient to transform these young men. He saved them to themselves, to the college, and to the world. One of them, not only as a minister of the church, brought like aid to many a wandering soul, but became in a special manner the helper of the President in the work of rescuing from entanglement in evil courses the young men who were tempted as he had been."¹ This was President Woods's method. In the ordinary college discipline of that day he placed small dependence. Believing that in every young man's heart there is a principle of honor that can be fully trusted if once aroused, he had little faith in other means of securing obedience and attention to college duties. So happy were the results of this personal intercourse with this gifted man, that one who knew him and the college well does not hesitate to write: "Bowdoin College offered means of education in this respect unequalled in the country. Students found themselves at once in the presence of a culture that might have been the product of the best universities and the most polished courts of the old world. They received from their President an influence such as—as has been well remarked—men go abroad to seek; such as breathes in the aisles of old cathedrals. They learned from him what reverence means and loyalty. They learned that society is not a mere human invention."

At the same time his colleagues and the public were not always content with methods and efforts that seemed to give a major share of attention to the bad boys, while the good ones were allowed to govern themselves. College students did not cease to be human, and according as one looked at what passed unpunished, or at what was entirely prevented, was he inclined to blame or praise the policy favored by the President, if not invariably pursued, for over a quarter of a century.

In accordance with a desire expressed on the acceptance of his appointment, President Woods went abroad in 1840 to study the educational methods and institutions of the old world. He went with a bias toward mediævalism that was ever a source of wonder to those who knew him to be a lover as well as a descendant of staunch Puritan divines. This extract from a letter written at Oxford, where he became intimately acquainted with Dr. Pusey, will explain why it was sometimes asked if he were not at heart a ritualist.

"All my prepossessions in favor of the English system of education have been justified after the most minute inspection. The studies are not more extensive or more thorough than with us; but there is here a magnificence of architecture, an assemblage of paintings, statues, gardens, and walks; above all a solemnity and grandeur of religious worship which does more to elevate the taste and purify the character than the whole encyclopædia of knowledge. In each one of the twenty colleges here there is a chapel, the poorest of which surpasses the richest I have ever seen in America. And the service daily performed in them is congruous to the place. In several of them it is performed by eight chaplains and sixteen choristers, robed in white, who are all supported by the foundations, and by whom day by day, and year after year, God is magnified in strains delivered down from the primitive church, if not the very strains of David himself. The effect produced by the service thus performed is inconceivably great, especially upon the young men here."¹

Not long after his return the President had the well-deserved pleasure of realizing in a new college chapel, the dream of his youth and the joy of later years, a structure "eloquently building into itself the expressive cross and lifting up its spires to heaven as accompaniments of the prayers rising from it morning and evening." Though associated with the name of Governor King, it is in reality a monument to President Woods. His skill and constancy secured the money which warranted so expensive a building and which in large measure met the cost of its erection. Without the thirty thousand dollars received as a contingent remainder from the Bowdoin estate, the college would have been obliged to content itself for another score of years with the wooden chapel that had already served through three administrations. His views, too, were exemplified both in the architecture of the exterior and the arrangements of the interior. At his request Mr. Richard Upjohn, of New York City, designed a Romanesque church, which, built of undressed granite, from a neighboring quarry, has been the pride of each succeeding generation of Bowdoin students. The corner-stone was laid July 16, 1845, with impressive Masonic ceremonies and an oration by Hon. Charles S. Davis of the class of 1807; the building was dedicated June 7, 1855, the sermon being preached by Professor Roswell D. Hitchcock. An important feature in the decoration of the chapel proper was left for friends of the college of subsequent years. The twelve large panels of this "grave and lofty room with its glowing windows and its starry roof" have from time to time been filled with copies of famous paintings illustrative of Bible history.²

²The majority of New Englanders believed that meeting-houses, including college chapels, should be constructed according to the laws of acoustics. President Woods held that a church should be erected according to the law of optics. The Bowdoin chapel was so erected. The President, however, was by no

At the beginning of this administration several circumstances, among them the inability to call at once a new professor to the chair of rhetoric and oratory, and the absence of the president abroad, led to the resumption of the practice of employing one or more tutors each year. The tenure of office and the character of these appointments, however, were materially changed, as will be seen by the fact that over one-half of those employed became professors in this or other colleges, while the average term of service of the others was nearly double that usual in the early years of the college.

For some time at this period the funds of the college not only yielded little income, but had no market value. When the general liquidation had cleared the financial situation somewhat, the treasurer reported that bank stocks, which had cost upwards of eighty thousand dollars, were now worth fifty thousand or means destitute of tact. When a lectern was presented the college, he permitted it to be placed in the library and allowed an orthodox pulpit to remain upon the platform. The following description, together with the two illustrations, will give to those who have not seen it, some idea of a structure which has exerted an influence as real as it has been silent and unperceived. The facade is strongly marked by twin towers, the spires of which rise to a height of one hundred and twenty feet. The main walls equal in length the height of the towers and slant off the nave, which forms the chapel proper, from the aisles. These, thus converted into separate rooms, together with the choir in the rear, make a home for the library. The transepts break the long reach of the low roof of the aisles and afford entrance and office rooms. It is the nave that especially illustrates the æsthetic views of President Woods. On passing through the vestibule, one finds himself in a broad aisle, on either side of which are five forms running lengthwise with three rows of seats, each behind and above the other. These are occupied by the students, the lower classes sitting nearer the entrance, while members of the faculty occupy seats between the forms, or on the platform which occupies the entire end of the room. High above this platform is the gallery which affords admission to the room lately used for the art collections. The entrance to it is so arranged that the large rose window at the east end pours a flood of light into the chapel in the morning. Directly opposite is the organ loft with a gallery for the choir, and a tasteful organ, the gift of a recent graduate and his wife. The wood-work, all of black walnut, has designs in relief in harmony with architecture of the building. The smooth walls rise nearly forty feet above the wainscoting before they are broken by the clerestory windows. This space is divided by decorative frescoing, into twelve large panels for as many paintings. On the north side are scenes from New Testament history, viz., the annunciation, the adoration of the magi, the baptism, the transfiguration, Peter and John healing the cripple, and Paul on Mars Hill. Opposite are St. Michael and the dragon, Adam and Eve, and Moses giving the law. The ceiling, which is open to the roof, is painted blue with golden stars.

would realize that sum. This, however, does not represent the entire loss. By the failure of the dividends and the successive annual deficits, the college had contracted debts that impaired still further its endowment. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that half of Bowdoin's income-producing property was lost during this financial depression.

In 1841, the trustees voted that members of the Faculty should spend a portion of the winter vacation in personal appeals for assistance for the college "in its present precarious condition." The professors naturally went to members of the religious denomination to which they belonged. Their appeal was often met with the reply, "We do not know whether Bowdoin College is to be a Congregational institution or not. It is ours by its history, but a majority of its trustees differ from us either in doctrinal belief or church affiliations." Most New England colleges were denominational. Sectarian spirit in Maine was perhaps as strong as at any period in this century. It seemed necessary, as well as desirable, that the college should declare its position. A declaration, therefore, was drawn up and signed by eleven of the fourteen trustees and by thirty-four of the forty-one overseers.

After stating in a preamble the desirableness of making the denominational character of the college known and of furnishing assurance of its future policy, this document declares:

First—That science and literature are not to be separated from morals and religion in the administration of the college.

Second—That this can be secured and financial strength obtained through an established denominational position.

Third—That though not required by its charter, the college has been and still is of the Orthodox Congregational denomination.

Fourth—That no change of its character in this direction is contemplated.

Fifth—That trustees, overseers, and faculty should perform their duties so as not to conflict in any degree with the moral and religious instruction to be given in accordance with its denominational character, and that such instruction should be given by officers of that religious faith.

Sixth—That the document does not prevent the Boards of the future from making changes, provided they show proper regard to the circumstances of this declaration.

Seventh—That it is intended to serve not only as a basis for pecuniary aid, but also for conciliation of different views and interests.¹

Provided with this statement, Professor Upham, the soliciting agent of the college, again appealed to the Congregationalists of Maine and Massachusetts. Almost all of the seventy thousand dollars which he secured came from that denomination. This large accession to the college funds, besides ensuring the completion of the chapel, which it was found would cost three times the fifteen thousand at first appropriated, warranted the erection of a new dormitory which the increase of students had long made desirable. This was built in 1843 at a cost of nine thousand dollars, and four years later was formally named Appleton Hall, in honor of the second president of the college.

A portion of the new endowment was devoted by the donors to the foundation of the Collins professorship of natural and revealed religion. This chair was the result of a belief on the part of several friends of the college that the time and thought of one man could well be given to the direct work of moral and religious instruction outside of the organized course of study. The provisions of its incumbency are so peculiar and so frequently misunderstood that they are given in full.

“The professor shall at all times be selected from ministers or ordained clergymen in regular standing of the Trinitarian Congregational denomination of Christians.

“The professor shall not be a member of the executive government of the college, nor be required or allowed to communicate any knowledge of the character, opinions, or conduct of any student of the college obtained by intercourse or conversation with the students.

“It shall be his duty to endeavor to cultivate and maintain a familiar intercourse with the students, and to visit and converse with them at their chambers; and by conversation, as well as by more formal teaching and preaching, to impress upon their minds the truths of the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, and their suitableness to promote the happiness of the present life, and the necessity that they should be cordially embraced to secure the happiness of a future and endless life.

“The Trustees and Overseers of the college may regulate the manner in which these duties shall be performed, and may prescribe other duties to be performed, including ordinary instruction in the college; but they may not do this so as to prevent the performance of the duties enjoined, or so as to cause the professor to teach or conduct in any manner inconsistent with the faithful performance of those duties.”

The chair was held by a succession of distinguished men. The first was Calvin Ellis Stowe, of the class of 1824, who resigned the position in 1852, to accept a professorship at Andover Theological Seminary. He was succeeded by Roswell Dwight Hitchcock, whose long connection subsequently with Union Theological Seminary testifies to the character of his work at Bowdoin. Egbert Coffin Smyth then held the chair for seven years, till he, like the first incumbent, was drawn away to Andover Hill. The duties of the position were then discharged by the venerated and beloved Alphens Spring Packard for the last twenty years of his life. For several years before his death the income from the endowment of this chair was insufficient to pay the salary of the incumbent, and, while the title has been held of late by the professor of Greek, it is definitely understood that he assumes only a portion of the duties prescribed. The scope of these is well illustrated by the annual report of Professor Hitchcock for the year 1854:

“First of all his care is to make the particular acquaintance of each individual student, as he enters upon his college course; gaining, if possible, his confidence that he may learn his character and adopt the wisest measures for the mental and moral advancement of each and of all. To this end, the students are invited to his house; called upon, so far as practicable, at their rooms; and in every way encouraged to make him their friend and adviser. These endeavors, he desires to say, have met with the kindest and most generous appreciation on the part of the students whose bearing towards himself has been everything that could be asked.

“During the whole of the fall and a part of the spring term, he has had the Freshmen three recitations a week in Paley’s Natural Theology; connecting with these recitations, near the beginning of the collegiate year, a short series of practical lectures on such subjects as Health, Study, Manners and Morals. With the Sophomore class, a few weeks in the spring term were devoted to the reading of Cicero's Treatise De contemptenda morte. With the Juniors, Alexander's Moral Science, assigned to the summer term and last year gone through with, has this year been omitted on account of the shortening of the term.

“On Saturday evenings, once a fortnight, religious lectures have been delivered, the attendance upon which, though voluntary, has been as large as the dimensions of the lecture room have allowed us to accommodate.

“And, finally, on the Sabbath in the village church, where a large majority of the students worship, some ten or twelve discourses have been delivered with special reference, in most cases, to the peculiar circumstances and wants of a community like this of ours.

“In all of which labors, so entirely congenial to his own tastes, the undersigned has enjoyed the heartiest sympathy and co-operation of the president and other officers of the college, to whom he feels himself largely indebted for that measure of success and comfort with which he has been enabled to pursue his work.”

The definite avowal that the college was a Congregationalist institution aroused much feeling on the part of a few earnest and active friends who were on the Board of Trustees, and did not agree with the majority of their colleagues, either as to the facts stated in the declaration, or as to the policy to be pursued. They held that the college was founded by the state, that differences in theological matters had not then divided the churches of the commonwealth, and were not before the mind of the principal benefactor. They admitted that the declaration debarred the college from choosing any one save a Congregationalist as president or as theological professor, but maintained that it should not control their action in filling vacancies in their Board. This view was antagonized at the time by a majority of the Overseers, and several elections to the upper Board were vetoed by the lower. A prominent layman in the Baptist denomination was then chosen, and subsequently two Congregational clergymen were elected. Since that period a majority have belonged to this denomination, although care has been taken to have other protestant denominations represented. Subsequent gifts have been conditioned upon the denominational character of the college, which there has been little disposition, of late years, to question.

At the Commencement of 1852, the semi-centennial of the opening of the college was celebrated with much eclat. Over four hundred of the thousand living graduates were present, among them the three survivors of the first graduating class. The anniversary exercises consisted of an address by Nehemiah Cleaveland, reviewing the history of the college with special reference to its personnel, an address by Chief Justice Tenney on the same subject viewed from the standpoint of the curriculum, a poem by Rev. Ephraim Peabody, and the singing of an ode written by Rev. Elijah Kellogg. At the anniversary dinner, held in a temporary building erected for that purpose on the campus, Hon. George Evans of the Class of 1815 presided, and, among other speakers, gracefully called upon Hon. Franklin Pierce as one of the two sons of Bowdoin towards whom the nation was now looking for a chief magistrate. His college mate, Hon. John P. Hale, was the candidate of the Free Soil party for the presidency. The attendance of the public was perhaps greater than at any subsequent Commencement, as three thousand persons are reported to have sought admission to the church.

The important place the Medical School had won for itself in professional circles led many friends of the college to believe that the time had come for a law school to be added to the collegiate foundation. In 1850, and again at a later period, a professor of law, and statutes for such a school were definitely decided upon by the Trustees. On each occasion, however, it proved impossible to secure at once the additional endowment of twenty-five thousand dollars upon which the execution of the votes was conditioned. In the formulation of these plans the advocates of the school had the assistance and sympathy of Professor Simon Greenleaf, who partially consented to lend his services as lecturer. The two gentlemen selected as law professors had served as chief justice, respectively, of Maine and of Vermont.

The purchase and removal of the old tavern in the corner near the church, the inclosure of more land to the south and the grove on the east of the dormitories, the planting of the buckthorn hedge and the adjacent belt of trees, all took place in this administration, and converted the college yard into the spacious campus of the present day. Unfortunately, neither the taste of the landscape gardener nor the votes of the Boards had influence over the sandy soil. When the railroad was constructed through the village, a large amount of clay and loam was distributed over the inclosure with good results. Subsequent attempts at enrichment of the soil have been confined to very limited portions.

There were few changes in the curriculum during this administration; the languages, ancient and modern, and mathematics continued to hold far the largest part of the course. English literature was introduced as a voluntary study in 1855, and a few years later a term was taken from the higher mathematics and given to physics. The conservatism of the professor of chemistry and mineralogy, the restraint of narrow means, and especially the difficulty of finding a place in a curriculum over which the principle of required rather than elective studies held sway, prevented any material increase of instruction in the natural sciences in the academic department.

Professor Paul A. Chadbourne, subsequently president of Williams College, succeeded Professor Cleaveland in 1859. Not long afterwards the establishment of the Josiah Little professorship of Natural Science enabled the college to add to its teachers a graduate of 1859, Cyrus Fogg Brackett, now professor of physics at Princeton.

This professorship, and the bequest a year previous of ten thousand dollars from Col. George William Boyd, of the class of 1811, were the substantial beginnings of a series of testamentary gifts from alumni, which have been and must continue to be a most essential factor in the maintenance of the efficiency and prosperity of the institution.

President Woods's extreme independence in ecclesiastical matters had repeatedly separated him from prominent clergymen in the Congregational denomination. His reactionary views in regard to political matters, which, though not proclaimed, were never concealed, and which the events of the civil war brought into prominence, had naturally produced much dissatisfaction in the dominant political party. These circumstances may have hastened a resignation which he intended to offer on attaining his sixtieth year. It was tendered in July, 1866. He carried from the position he had held so long the love and esteem of a larger number of Bowdoin students than any of his predecessors had been privileged to win; and the sharpest critics of his actions—more frequently his inaction—willingly paid him their heartiest respect as a cultured gentleman and a profound scholar. The subsequent years of his quiet life were devoted to historical studies. He died, after a long illness, at Boston, December 24, 1878.

The twenty-seven years during which he presided over the college were, as a whole, a period of marked prosperity. The average number of students was slightly greater than in any following administration. The institution in part won, and surely maintained, an honorable position among New England colleges which has been a source of strength and influence to it in later years of transition from the old to the new in educational methods and ideals.

Since a majority of the nine hundred graduates of this administration are still living, the time has not come to mention individual names. It can safely be said, however, that no future student of the history of the nation, whether legal, political, military, religious or educational, will fail to find prominent actors who received their diplomas from the hand of President Woods.

CHAPTER VII.

PRESIDENT HARRIS'S ADMINISTRATION.

President Harris—His views on collegiate instruction—Teaching of Natural Science—Changes in the corps of instructors—Memorial Hall—Student societies—The Peucinian and Athenæan—The Greek letter societies—Resignation of President Harris.

The fifth president of Bowdoin College was the first to be chosen from its alumni. Samuel Harris, a member of the class of 1833, was graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1838, and, after two pastorates in Massachusetts, was called to the chair of systematic theology at Bangor Seminary. The duties of this position he had discharged with marked success for twelve years, when, in 1866, he was chosen, at the suggestion of the retiring president, to fill the vacancy. He at first declined, but was persuaded, several months later, to accept, and entered upon his office in May, 1867.

His inaugural, delivered the following Commencement, was upon the necessity, the idea, and the methods of college instruction. The following extracts will show the aims of this administration :

“The college is preparatory to the professional school. It aims to develop the man, to ground him in the principles of knowledge, and to make him acquainted with its methods and instruments. The professional school and the school of industry and arts aim to impart the special training and knowledge necessary to a special profession. . . . The college aims to effect a systematic and harmonious discipline of the whole man, and thus to prepare the student for the special study necessary to fit him for his special business in life. He is not shut up by his college education to one of the so-called learned professions, but is trained as a man so as to more readily master any business, and in whatever business to possess stronger powers, a better balanced mind, a richer culture and a broader sympathy with all true minds and true learning in other professions. . . . Training, then, is the first and dominant design of collegiate education ; training that produces the happiest development of the physical, intellectual and moral powers. The second design is to impart knowledge. A well arranged college course will impart the largest amount of useful knowledge possible in securing the most complete mental discipline. But the value of the college course does not consist so much in the amount of knowledge as in its quality.

“The demand that increased attention be given to the natural sciences is reasonable. The recent expansion of knowledge in this direction has been so great, that a collegiate education cannot be complete, nor adapted to the times, which does not introduce the student to these sciences. They provide also a peculiar intellectual discipline; they train the powers of observation, of discrimination and classification; they educate in inductive reasoning; they hold the mind rigorously to facts; they restrain, or at least ought to restrain, the tendency to fanciful speculation and theorizing.”

In accordance with the opinion last expressed, a place was made in the last two years of the curriculum for the practically new studies of botany, zoology, physiology, and geology. The addition, in 1868, of Professor George L. Goodale, now professor of Natural History at Harvard and, two years later, of Professor Edward S. Morse, to the corps of instructors in science, and the introduction of required laboratory work from the students, gave especial interest and prominence to that side of the curriculum. A fortnightly publication, known as the Bowdoin Scientific Review, was conducted by Professors Brackett and Goodale for two years. The enthusiasm they aroused is indicated by the circumstance that five per cent. of the students graduated during this administration have devoted themselves to scientific investigation as their life work.

On the other side of the curriculum, marked changes resulted from the death or retirement of the older professors. In ancient languages, Professor Jotham B. Sewall, now master of Thayer Academy, succeeded Professor Packard; in mathematics, Professor Charles G. Rockwood, Jr., now of Princeton College, followed Professor Smyth. Professor Upham became professor emeritus, and President Harris assumed himself the duties of the department of mental and moral philosophy. The public appreciation which his Philosophical Basis of Theism and Self-Revela- tion of God have obtained on each side of the ocean, afford ample testimony to the quality and character of his instruction.

The civil war had hardly closed before it was proposed to erect a hall in memory of the Bowdoin students who had fallen or taken part personally in the struggle. The scheme enlisted the enthusiastic labor of Professor William Smyth who, before his sudden death in 1868, had solicited upwards of thirty thousand dollars for this object, chiefly from the alumni and in small amounts. Plans by S. B. Backus, of New York City, for a structure in the French Gothic style of architecture were accepted in 1868, and the exterior of the building was erected of Hallowell granite at a cost of forty-seven thousand dollars. The interior was completed in General Chamberlain's administration through the liberality of Mrs. Valeria Stone, of Malden, Mass., who gave twenty-five thousand dollars for this object. The first floor contains a room for Faculty meetings, a large assembly room and two recitation rooms. The second floor is given entirely to the Memorial Hall proper, a spacious audience room used for the public exercises of the college. On the walls hang portraits of the presidents, benefactors, and distinguished graduates of the institution. On the east side on bronze tablets, the gift of Gen. Thomas H. Hubbard, of the Class of 1857, are inscribed the names and rank of two hundred and ninety Bowdoin students who fought to maintain the Union. The number is significant, if one remembers that there were in 1864, less than twelve hundred living graduates.

The two general literary societies, the Peucinian and the Athenæan, have played an important part at Bowdoin not only in the social life of the students, but also in their education. Their establishment dates from the first decade of the century, and they gradually came to include in their membership the entire student body. Each held regular meetings for literary exercises for over fifty years. Many of the distinguished men whose names appear in their triennial catalogues—catalogues that rivaled in size and usefulness those of the college—are said to have gained as well as displayed oratorical skill in the carefully prepared debates which were a leading feature of these occasions. The anniversaries of the societies, at which an oration and poem were delivered by some prominent graduate or honorary member, stood next to Commencement as the chief events of the academic year. The intense rivalry that long prevailed between them fortunately extended to the character of their literary exercises and the growth and value of their respective libraries. The amounts contributed by undergraduates for the purchase of books were not infrequently double that appropriated by the Boards for the increase of the college library. Much care was taken in the selection of new books; the advice of the President and members of the Faculty was often sought. Graduate members, as a rule, maintained their old interest in the organization, and were often solicited for gifts, both of books and of money for their purchase. The Athenæan Society received as late as 1886, a bequest of one thousand dollars from the estate of a former member. The Ayer book fund established in his memory by the society, adds annually fifty volumes to the college library. Their two libraries, each numbering upwards of five thousand volumes, when, in this administration, their growth ceased, were remarkably complete and valuable collections of the general literature and current periodicals of the forty years preceding. They occupied, with the assembly rooms of the societies, one-half the lower story of Maine Hall, which had been fitted up for their occupation in President Allen's administration. In 1880 they were merged in the college library.

The story of the decline of these societies is that of similar organizations in the other New England colleges. For a series of years the secret, or Greek Letter, fraternities existed side by side with them. Gradually, however, the latter gained in influence and importance and engrossed the time, thought, and interest formerly given to organizations more avowedly and distinctively literary. Of several attempts to revive undergraduate interest in them, the most notable occurred in this administration, when the Bowdoin Association of the East offered, for several years, a prize of fifty dollars to the best debater in a public contest between the two. Since these contests there have been no literary exercises conducted by the societies.

BOWDOIN COLLEGE IN 1862.

A chapter of the Alpha Delta Phi Fraternity was established at Bowdoin in 1841, one of the Psi Upsilon in 1843, one of the Delta Kappa Epsilon in 1844, one of Theta Delta Chi in 1854, revived in 1872, one of Delta Upsilon in 1857, revived in 1893, and one of Zeta Psi in 1867. For thirty years it has been customary for a large majority of each entering class to accept invitations to membership in some one of these societies. They are recognized by the Faculty, many of whom as former members are welcomed at their meetings. Each has a well furnished hall. While social intercourse and good fellowship are frankly avowed objects, literary work has a hardly less important part in their activities. Though their rivalries occasionally lead to a partisanship in the selection of class officers, as foolish as it is unfortunate, it is believed they supply a valuable means for acquaintance and helpfulness between the upper and lower classes, and tend to neutralize some of the bad effects of the strong class feeling which always prevails in the smaller colleges. The element of secrecy has not been, to any extent worthy of notice, a means of hiding dissipation or unlawful practices. On the other hand the society pride has occasionally been evoked as a restraining force in the case of those inclined to evil courses.

The responsibilities of the college presidency weighed heavily upon Dr. Harris. He felt, furthermore, a distrust of his personal qualifications for obtaining the large increase of endowment necessary to a successful accomplishment of his plans. These circumstances led him, to the sincere regret of the friends of Bowdoin, to accept, in 1871, the professorship of theology in Yale University, a position he still occupies.

PRESIDENT CHAMBERLAIN'S ADMINISTRATION.

President Chamberlain—Changes in college methods—The scientific department—Course in engineering—Its discontinuance and rearrangement of the curriculum—The military drill—The Alumni Association—Representation of the alumni on the Board of Overseers—The Winkley and Stone professorships—President Chamberlain's resignation.

The sixth president, like his predecessor, was chosen from the alumni. Joshua Lawrence Chamberlain, of the Class of 1852, after completing a course of theological study at Bangor Seminary, was recalled to Bowdoin as an instructor, and held in succession the chairs of rhetoric and oratory, and of modern languages. In 1862 he received leave of absence, entered the army, and served to the end of the contest. He was twice wounded, once so seriously that its effects are still felt; was promoted by Gen. Grant on the field of battle to be brigadier-general "for gallant conduct in leading his brigade in a charge"; was assigned to receive the surrender of Lee's army at Appomattox Court House; and left the army with the rank of brevet major-general and the command of a division. After a brief service as acting president, at the close of President Woods's administration, he resigned his professorship of rhetoric and oratory to accept the office of governor of the State, to which he was chosen in 1866, and to which he was thrice re-elected by large majorities.

On entering upon his administration President Chamberlain, under the authorization of the Boards, and in response to a wide-spread demand and expectation, inaugurated several changes in former college methods, and a distinct and considerable enlargement of the curriculum. Morning prayers were held after breakfast, and all the recitations of the day followed at consecutive hours. Evening prayers, except on Sunday, were discontinued. The so-called "dignity days" were given up, all classes had the same number of exercises (fifteen each week), and there were no recitations on Saturday. The long winter vacation was abolished, Commencement was placed in June, and the summer vacation correspondingly lengthened. The account of scholarship was kept entirely separate from that of department. Previously, irregularity of attendance upon religious and other required exercises affected, to some extent, the standing of the scholar in the assignment of college honors. Physical exercise was required. The gymnasium had long been established, was under the care of an accomplished instructor, but those who most needed athletic culture had least frequently availed themselves of its advantages. The college library was made more accessible to the students by a large increase in the number of hours it was open. The tuition, which had been made to include various incidental charges and raised to sixty dollars in the previous administration, was placed at seventy-five dollars. Room rent, which for half a century had been ten dollars a year for each person, was now determined by the desirableness of the rooms occupied.

To meet the call for a more extended study of the natural sciences, to satisfy in part the ever-recurring demand for a course, practical rather than classical, and to supply the needs of those who desired a college training, but from age or circumstances were unable to devote three years of preparatory study to the ancient languages, a scientific department was established, parallel with, but quite distinct from, the classical department. The latter was expected to maintain the traditions of the past, while the new course met the wants of those anxious for collegiate culture, but also for an early entrance into relations with the active world. The curriculum of the public schools of the state rendered impracticable an entrance requirement in modern languages or in natural science, and, as Greek could not be demanded with consistency, admission to the scientific department, despite extra examinations in history and English, was, for a year or two, more easily obtained than to the classical department. A large increase, however, in the amount of Latin required, soon shut off all applicants who had not pursued a full three years' course of study in well-conducted high schools and academies.

The courses in the scientific department were prescribed, and consisted, in Freshman year, of French, mathematics, English and ancient history: in Sophomore year, of chemistry, mathematics, logic, botany, and mineralogy: in Junior year, of German, physics, zoology, physiology, and astronomy: in Senior year, of geology, mental and moral philosophy, political economy, constitutional and international law.¹ Applied science was represented by a separate course made up of civil and mechanical engineering, combined with the above by the addition of drawing in place of the ancient history of Freshman year, and of the logic of Sophomore year, and by the omission, during the last two years, of the other studies except German, physics, and political economy. This four years' course in engineering was, from the first, under the personal direction of Professor George L. Vose, afterwards of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, an instructor whose text-books and pupils alike testify to the character of the work he did at Bowdoin.

During the decade throughout which the Scientific Department was maintained, about thirty per cent. of those applying for admission to college, entered it, and about twenty-five per cent. of the graduates for the same period received the degree of Bachelor of Science. During its entire history, the college has been largely dependent upon tuition charges to pay the salaries of instructors. The experience of ten years showed that the demand for what this department afforded, was not sufficient to warrant an institution with so few endowed professorships in a longer maintenance of it. On the one hand, it had, as a competitor, the State Agricultural College, with free tuition and lower requirements for admission: on the other, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, with facilities in the way of material appliances and laboratories which it could not equal.

The discontinuance of the Scientific Department was followed by a careful re-arrangement of the college curriculum, in which the principle of elective studies was frankly adopted, though with limitations as to their number and position in the course. The result was a mean between the old prescribed course and the modern university scheme of either departmental or entirely elective studies.

The important place taken by the officers of the volunteer forces during the civil war, led to a general movement at its close to introduce both military drill and the study of military science into the higher educational institutions of the country. The government was authorized to detail army officers for that purpose. Under this system the college enjoyed for ten years the services of several gentlemen whose instruction was excellent and highly appreciated in the recitation room. The military drill, however, which was required of all during half the year, soon became extremely unpopular with the students. They complained that the time it required was excessive and that the exercise itself was irksome. The suspension of a few students in the spring of 1874 for disrespect shown this part of the course, led to one of those sudden college rebellions, which possess an inexplicable power to carry into foolish and indefensible action not only the excitable and wayward, but also young men ordinarily clear-headed and well-disposed. With few exceptions all the members of the three lower classes signed a compact not to drill again. Despite the representations and arguments of the Faculty, they persisted in maintaining that they were obliged to keep this agreement with their associates. Consequently far the greater part of the student body were sent to their homes, followed by a circular letter to their parents stating that each student must renew within ten days his matriculation pledge of obedience to all the regulations of the college, including the requirements as to the military drill, on penalty of expulsion. This resulted in the return within the specified time of all save two or three. At the following Commencement, the Boards, not without strenuous opposition, made the military drill elective with work in the gymnasium. This arrangement continued until 1882, when instruction in military science was entirely discontinued.

A general association of the alumni was first formed in President Allen's administration; it was revived and reorganized in 1857, and has since, with the exception of a few years before and during the civil war, held annual meetings. Together with the subsidiary associations in several of the larger cities of the country, it has through its membership exerted much influence upon the conduct of college affairs, and through its various committees been of great service in increasing the endowment of the institution. Perhaps most notable of these undertakings was the raising in 1873 and the following years, of an alumni fund of one hundred thousand dollars to meet in some measure the urgent needs arising from the extension of the course of study.

The subject of the direct representation of the alumni on the Boards was naturally brought forward by the active manifestation of interest shown in this and the previous administration. After prolonged discussion and deliberation it has been found inexpedient, in the opinion of a large majority of the Board of Overseers, to attempt any modification of the charter of the college as to the method of filling vacancies in their body, but for over twenty years they have, in accordance with a formal vote passed in 1870, selected for one-half of these vacancies the nominees of the alumni association. The association chooses its nominee by a system of preliminary nominations from the entire body of the alumni, followed by a formal balloting which is carried on through the mail.

Gen. Chamberlain's administration was marked by substantial additions to the college funds.¹ Besides the alumni fund, just mentioned, in which generous gifts from many not alumni were included, Mr. Henry Winkley of Philadelphia liberally endowed the Latin professorship, and Mrs. Valeria Stone of Malden, Mass., gave fifty thousand dollars for the establishment of the Stone professorship of mental and moral philosophy. Since its endowment, this chair has been occupied by Professor George T. Ladd, now of Yale University, Professor Gabriel Campbell, now of Dartmouth College, Rev. Dr. Samuel G. Brown, the late president of Hamilton College, and President Hyde, the present incumbent. President Chamberlain suffered much during the later years of his administration from the wound which he had received in the war and which occasionally forbade personal attention to the duties of his office. Extended commercial enterprises, furthermore, in which he had gradually become interested, were making urgent demands upon his time and energies. These circumstances led to his resigning the presidency in 1883. The Boards, however, persuaded him to continue for two years, as lecturer, the instruction in political economy, constitutional and international law, which had been a popular and prominent feature of the course. Since that time his residence has been in New York City, where he is now president of the Institute of Arts.

CHAPTER IX.

PRESIDENT HYDE'S ADMINISTRATION.

Professor Packard's death—The college jury—Professor Chapman as dean of the faculty—President Hyde—Mission of the small college—Sargent Gymnasium—The curriculum—The observatory—The library—Benefactions—The Garelon bequest—Renovation of Maine Hall—The Walker Art Building—The Searles Science Building.

The interval of two years that followed President Chamberlain's resignation was marked by the sudden death of the acting president, Professor Alpheus S. Packard, which occurred immediately after the Commencement of 1884. He had spent sixty-five years in uninterrupted service of the college. He had known personally nearly every graduate of the institution. From them, as from the poet who voiced the sentiment, he had won

"Honor and reverence and the good repute
That follows faithful service as its fruit."

His departure removed the living link between the Bowdoin of the past and the present.

The transition from early methods of college discipline was emphasized, in 1883, in the adoption by the faculty and students of a scheme of government, devised by Professor Charles H. Smith, now of Yale University, which places in the hands of a college jury the right to decide, in cases of public disorder among the students, both as to the guilty parties and the penalty that shall be inflicted on them.¹ This jury is made up of representatives of each class and of each local chapter of an intercollegiate fraternity, and is presided over by its foreman. The President of the college attends, however, its regular meetings, brings matters to its attention, and gives advice when desired. He also retains the right to administer private advice and warning, without reference to the jury.

¹The details of this system are printed in "Articles of agreement between the faculty and students of Bowdoin College for the administration of justice in the college.

THE MARY F. S. SEARLES SCIENCE BUILDING.

APR 1906

The maintenance of college discipline under this system rested largely upon Prof. Henry L. Chapman, who had been appointed by the Boards dean of the faculty, and who performed this as well as most of the other duties of the executive office for two years. The precedents established at the outset have made this form of self-government an unobtrusive but, it is believed, an efficient means of leading the student body to realize the unity of interests between the teachers and the taught and the obligation resting upon the latter to maintain good order.

At the Commencement of 1885 the Boards unanimously chose Rev. William DeWitt Hyde president of the college and Stone professor of mental and moral philosophy. President Hyde was graduated with high honors at Harvard in 1879, at once entered upon the study of theology at Union Theological Seminary, and completed the course at Andover. After giving an additional year to the study of philosophy at Cambridge and at Andover, he held, until his call to Bowdoin, the pastorate of the Congregational church in Paterson, N. J.

President Hyde is a firm believer in the important mission of the small college. Stated in his own words¹ it is this:

“For combining sound scholarship with solid character; for making men both intellectually and spiritually free; for uniting the pursuit of truth with reverence for duty, the small college, open to the worthy graduates of every good high school, presenting a course sufficiently rigid to give symmetrical development, and sufficiently elastic to encourage individuality along congenial lines, taught by professors who are men first and scholars afterward, governed by kindly personal influence, and secluded from too frequent contact with social distractions, has a mission which no change of educational conditions can take away, and a policy which no sentiment of vanity or jealousy should be permitted to turn aside.”

The first year of this administration was marked by the completion of the Sargent Gymnasium. This was erected at a cost of twelve thousand dollars, of which one-half was contributed by alumni and the balance taken from the general funds of the institution. It was fully equipped with approved gymnastic apparatus at the expense of Dr. Dudley A. Sargent, of the Class of 1875, for several years instructor in physical culture here, and now director of the Hemenway Gymnasium at Harvard. The facilities thus secured have resulted in the development of the required gymnastic work of the previous administration into a definite system of physical culture, which is a recognized part of the curriculum, has its influence in deciding college honors, and requires the entire attention of one member of the faculty.¹

The changes in the curriculum, during this administration, have been gradual but noteworthy in their entirety. Required French and German have been moved forward into the first two years, and provision made for the continuance of the study of these languages in the following years. Natural science has been introduced into Sophomore year. New courses in history, English literature and political economy have been planned. General courses in each department are followed or supplemented by special courses of such a character that mental training as well as useful knowledge may be gained from every study, and not alone from those formally classed as disciplinary. As a result, the larger part of the course is nominally elective. Practically the under-graduate, while enabled to gratify his natural tastes and inclinations, is not allowed to select his studies at hap-hazard or for frivolous reasons. The restraint of special requirements for special courses, and the interference of hours of recitation compel all to choose and pursue courses from both the literary and the scientific side of the curriculum.

By a generous gift from Mr. John J. Taylor, of Fairbury, Ill., supplemented by contributions from several alumni, a substantial astronomical observatory was erected south-east of the chapel during the academic year 1890-1. Though the smallest of the college buildings, it is fully equipped and well adapted for purposes of instruction.

The college library is the largest collection of books in the state, yet it has suffered severely in the past from the poverty of the institution. For eighty years the average annual expenditure for books was less than two hundred dollars. These accessions, however, were selected with care by the presidents in earlier years, subsequently by the successive professors of modern languages who acted as librarian during the greater portion of this period. In 1863, when the collection numbered fifteen thousand volumes, an admirably prepared catalogue was published by the librarian, Rev. William P. Tucker. It is still in use as the basis of the card catalogue now employed. By a succession of gifts, of which the Bowdoin library was the most noteworthy, and by consolidation with the society libraries, the collection came, in 1883, to hold the tenth place in size among the college libraries of the country. While it has since lost its relative standing in this respect, by the rapid growth of recent rivals, it has made great advance in general usefulness to the student body through the more liberal policy the Boards have been able to pursue. The annual expenditure for books and periodicals is more than two thousand dollars. The annual accessions are two thousand volumes. Its administration requires and receives the entire time and attention of a librarian and an assistant librarian. Electric light has been introduced into Banister Hall; the reference portions are open ten hours each day; and the recent changes in methods of instruction have caused them to become working rooms for a large part of the student body. Through the generosity of John L. Sibley, A.M., Rev. Elias Bond, D.D., Henry J. Furber, Esq., and Mrs. John C. Dodge, book funds now amounting to $18,500 have been established during the last fifteen years.

In the numerous and notable gifts for educational purposes that have characterized the last two decades, Bowdoin has not been forgotten. Besides the two elaborate and expensive structures to be mentioned shortly, the college has received during this administration two hundred thousand dollars in money. One-half of this, the bequest of Daniel B. Fayerweather, of New York City, whom American colleges will long hold in grateful remembrance, is kept as a general fund, and one-half of the remainder was devoted by the donors to scholarship funds.

On New Year's day, 1892, the generous purposes of the late Mrs. Catherine M. Garelon, of Oakland, California, were made known to the President. In her own right and in accordance with the wishes of her brother, whose wealth she had inherited, she conveyed to trustees during her lifetime, a large amount of property to be gradually converted into interest-bearing securities for the further endowment of Bowdoin College, and for the establishment of a hospital in the city of Oakland. The amount the college is expected to realize ultimately is $400,000, the income of one-half of which is by the terms of the bequest to be applied to the use of the Medical School. The bequest is now being contested on technical grounds.

To supply the conveniences which modern times have made so common as to seem necessary, Maine Hall was entirely renovated in 1892, at an expense of ten thousand dollars. The same year two houses were built near the campus for the use of college professors. The house which was first purchased for the occupancy of President Harris and afterwards sold, has again become the property of the college and the residence of the president.

The art collections have been a unique feature in the equipment of Bowdoin which has long distinguished it among the colleges, if not among the universities, of the country. By the generosity of the Misses Walker of Waltham, Mass., this prominence will be continued through the beautiful structure erected for the proper exhibition of these collections and for the general promotion of art. This building, designed by Messrs. McKim, Mead and White of New York City, was erected by the donors as a memorial of their uncle, Theophilus Wheeler Walker, a prominent merchant of Boston. His interest in the institution was manifested during the administration of his cousin, President Woods, in providing accommodation for the paintings in the former Sophia Walker Gallery. The two illustrations give some conception of the manner in which his representatives, since his death, have carried out his later thought, and have given to the state as well as the college an edifice likely to be as enduring as the classic structures its architecture calls to mind. The building was dedicated June 7th, 1894.¹

¹The character of the decoration and the recent additions to the contents of the building is indicated by the following extract from the last report of the

The rapid change during the last few years in the methods of instruction in the natural sciences, rendered the accommodations in Adams Hall, though excellent when it was erected, meagre and insufficient now. The important place which chemistry, physics and biology had won for themselves in the curriculum made a new structure for the use of these three departments a necessity. By the liberality of Mr. Edward F. Searles this need was met almost as soon as stated. The Mary F. S. Searles Scientific Laboratory, named in memory of the wife of the donor, will be ready for occupancy in the fall of 1894. It is a brick building with stone trimmings, designed in the Elizabethan style of architecture by Mr. Henry Vaughan, of Boston. The extreme length is 172 feet, and the depth from front to rear of wings 107 feet. It is three stories in height with a well-lighted basement. The three departments have separate entrances and stairways, the chemical and physical occupying the northern and southern wings respectively, and the biological, the third floor. Upon the completion of the building each will have ample room and every facility in apparatus and material equipment for the instruction of larger classes than have yet entered college.

Curator of the Art Collections. "The educational use of the building and its contents has been held in mind constantly by the donors, who have supplemented the munificent gift of the structure by the donation of works of art of uniformly great value and of wide range as to variety. These objects include about forty choice specimens of ancient glass and pottery, dating from the seventh century B. C. onward; a marble portrait bust ascribed to the late Roman period; a set of Saracen armor, six pieces, eleventh century; various mediæval and modern weapons; Flemish tapestry; modern oil paintings, chiefly of the French schools, represented by Corot, Daubigny, Millet, Troyon, and others. American art is represented by works in oil, water-color, or pastel of J. Foxcroft Cole, F. Hopkinson Smith, Winslow Homer, J. Appleton Brown. A bronze bas-relief portrait of Mr. Theophilus Wheeler Walker, which has been set in the western wall of the Walker gallery, is the work of the sculptor, Daniel C. French. The beautiful large bronze lantern of the Sculpture Hall is a copy of one in the Château de Blois. The smaller wrought-iron lantern of the loggia is of old Italian workmanship. Bronze copies by De Angelis of Naples of the classical statues of Demosthenes and Sophocles have been erected in the niches on the front of the building, and on either side of the entrance copies in stone of the lions of the Loggia dei Lanzi. If the wall paintings of the Sculpture Hall by Elihu Vedder, John La Farge, Kenyon Cox, and Abbott Thayer are included with the above-mentioned American works, and those in the Bowdoin collection and among the college portraits, it will be seen that the college deserves a high rank among institutions possessing valuable specimens of our national art."

CHAPTER X.

THE MEDICAL SCHOOL OF MAINE.

Establishment—State aid—Dr. Nathan Smith—Proposed hospital—Dr. John D. Wells—Medical professors—Adams Hall—Seavey Anatomical Cabinet—Changes in the curriculum—Proposed removal to Portland—Bequest of Mrs. Garcelon.

Immediately upon his acceptance of the presidency of Bowdoin College, President Allen wrote to Dr. Nathan Smith, the founder of the Dartmouth Medical School, then professor of the theory and practice of medicine at Yale, with regard to the improvement of medical instruction in the state to which he was soon to remove. His correspondent said in reply: "I think after what experience I have had, we could form a medical school that would, in point of real utility, equal any in the country. In a new state like Maine, where neither habit nor parties have laid their ruthless hands on the public institutions, and where the minds of men are free from their poisoning influence, everything is to be hoped for. Such a field would be very inviting to me: and such a place I take Maine to be. For though they have heretofore been divided into parties, I am disposed to think, that now they have become a state and are left to themselves, party spirit will in a great measure subside, and they will be ambitious to promote the honor and the welfare of the state."

This hope of aid from the state was realized. The first legislature of Maine, to its honor and to the material increase of the health and happiness of the people, established, June 27, 1820, the Medical School of Maine, to be under the control of the Trustees and Overseers of Bowdoin College; granted fifteen hundred dollars for procuring necessary books, plates, preparations and other apparatus; and authorized the annual payment of one thousand dollars for general expenses until otherwise ordered. The first series of lectures was given in the spring of 1821 by Dr.

Smith, assisted by Dr. John Doane Wells, who, at first as assistant, but soon as a full professor, conducted the courses in anatomy and surgery, and by Professor Cleaveland, who had charge of the chemistry for nearly forty years, and for an equal period was the devoted and efficient secretary of the school. Twenty-one young men were in attendance. The next year there were forty-nine, and subsequent classes to the present time have averaged nearly eighty.

Temporary quarters, as it was then supposed, were provided for the school in Massachusetts Hall. Time moved on but the school did not. The building came to be spoken of as the Medical College. Possibly the conservatism of the secretary was responsible in part for this inaction. The accommodations, narrow and insufficient as they were, had served several of the largest and most talented classes to which he had lectured. He saw no insuperable objections to remaining. The principal reason, however, lay in the changed relations of the college and the commonwealth. The fostering hand of the state which, it was believed, would continue to support the institution, abandoned it at an early age. Subsequent legislatures did not maintain the reputation of the first. The need of a general hospital, both for the insane and for surgical cases requiring especial skill, early became manifest to the Medical Faculty and to the leading physicians of the state. The desirableness of connecting this with the medical school was even more clear. The legislators, though providing an act of incorporation for such a hospital in 1826, after the persistent efforts of Professor Cleaveland and Hon. Robert P. Dunlap, of the Class of 1815, repeatedly refused to endow it or make any grant sufficient to warrant an attempt to open it, and depend upon private benevolence for its maintenance. Not only were these attempts to secure a hospital at Brunswick unsuccessful, but the annual grant itself was discontinued in 1834. How efficient this had been in establishing the character and increasing the efficiency of medical instruction, is shown by the circumstance that the school possessed, at this time, the finest library and apparatus of any in New England, though four others surpassed it in age.

Dr. Smith's connection with the school was severed in 1825, when his duties in New Haven had become such as to forbid his absence. His successors in the chair of the theory and practice of medicine have been, almost without exception, gentlemen who have had extended experience as lecturers in other medical schools in this country. Dr. William Sweetser and the present incumbent, Dr. Israel Thorndike Dana, may from their length of service, extending over a score of years, be claimed as belonging especially to the Maine Medical School. The early death, in 1830, of Dr. John Doane Wells, was a severe blow to the school in which he had taken the deepest interest. The expenditure of a great portion of the legislative grant of $1,500 was made by him during an extended residence abroad, and to his skill as a surgeon and brilliancy as a lecturer much of the success the school attained in its first decade was due. Of his successors in the chair of anatomy and surgery, only Dr. Edmund R. Peaslee exceeded him in length of service. In 1857 the chair was divided and instruction in physiology was added to the duties of Dr. David S. Comant, the new professor of anatomy. Of subsequent professors of surgery, Dr. William W. Greene and Dr. Stephen H. Weeks have each held the chair upwards of a decade. In 1825 the chair of obstetrics was established, and Dr. James McKeen, of Topsham, the youngest son of the first president of the college, filled it for fourteen years. His successors have been Dr. Ebenezer Wells, Dr. Fordyce Barker, Dr. Amos Nourse, Dr. Theodore H. Jewett, Dr. William C. Robinson, Dr. Edward W. Jenks, and the present incumbent, Dr. Alfred Mitchell. At the time of offering instruction in this subject, the fees were increased from forty-five to fifty dollars. These, as well as the length of the course, three months, remained practically unchanged for thirty years.

An important addition to the course was made in 1846, by the establishment of the chair of materia medica and therapeutics. No sketch, however short, can omit mention of the service in this branch of the curriculum of Dr. Charles A. Lee, Dr. Frederic H. Gerrish, and Dr. Charles O. Hunt. Three years later a formal course of lectures on medical jurisprudence was first given. With two exceptions, the subsequent annual courses on this subject have been given by Hon. John Searle Tenney, Hon. Charles W. Goddard, and Hon. Lucilius A. Emery. These and other changes required, in 1856, the lengthening of the term to four months.

A most important event in the history of the school was the erection, in 1860-61, of a building especially adapted for its use. The inconveniences suffered in the cramped quarters in Massachusetts Hall had begun seriously to threaten the prosperity of the institution. Its friends, therefore, petitioned the legislature, in 1858, for aid in erecting a home of its own. The petition failed. The following year it was renewed, and one-half a township of wild land was granted for this purpose. Unfortunately, however, its opponents succeeded in attaching a proviso to the effect that the "legislature may make any necessary regulation for the admission and graduation of students." This provision, which looked towards a future change of attitude towards homœopathic and eclectic schools of medicine, was extremely distasteful to the Maine Medical Association. That body finally informed the Trustees that if the grant were accepted on these terms it would refuse graduates of the Medical School admittance to its membership. Happily, by the united efforts of the college and the association, the obnoxious proviso was repealed in 1861. By the $5,500 obtained from this source, to which an equal amount was added from the college funds, and a generous gift from Seth Adams, Esq., of Boston, the Trustees were enabled to build and equip Adams Hall, according to designs furnished by the secretary of the medical faculty, Professor Paul A. Chadbourne. It was first occupied in 1862. Through the gift of one thousand dollars from Dr. Calvin Seavey of Bangor, important additions were made at this time to the anatomical cabinet of the school. By the zeal and interest of the present incumbent of the chair of anatomy, frequent accessions have been made during the last decade to the collection, until the facilities for study in this department are unusually complete.

In 1872 a separate chair was established for instruction in physiology. It has been held in succession by Dr. Robert Amory, Professor Burt Green Wilder, Dr. Henry H. Hunt, and Dr. Charles D. Smith. The last named is also lecturer on public hygiene, which has been a part of the curriculum since 1875. The introduction of laboratory courses in chemistry,—a subject which has always been in charge of a member of the academic Faculty,—and a general readjustment of the curriculum, led to an extension of the term to twenty weeks in 1886, and an increase in the tuition charge, which is now eighty-three dollars, with a graduation fee of twenty-five dollars. Reference only can be made to the endeavor, in this decade, to raise the standard of medical instruction by requiring an entrance examination from those who are not graduates of the higher educational institutions, and in the present decade by requiring attendance upon three full courses of medical lectures.

The medical faculty, as well as a large majority of the practitioners throughout the state, have been long of the opinion that the efficiency of the school could be promoted by its removal to Portland on account of the enlarged clinical advantages to be secured in connection with the hospitals and dispensaries of that city. This proposal, after considerable opposition, has met with the approval of the Trustees and Overseers and would doubtless have been carried out before this, were it not for the uncertainty in regard to the bequest of Mrs. Catherine M. Garcelon. If her generous purpose is accomplished, the Medical School, with an endowment of two hundred thousand dollars, will be enabled both to erect new buildings and to provide for the further enlargement of the course of study it now offers.
